Although the history of this litigation is set forth in the opinion of the court, I deem it appropriate to restate the principal facts of the case in direct connection with my examination of the question upon which the decision turns. That question is whether the suit in the circuit court of the United States was, as to the relief sought against the attorney-general of Minnesota, forbidden by the eleventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States, declaring that "the judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state." That examination, I may say at the outset, is entered upon with no little embarrassment, in view of the fact that the views expressed by me are not shared by my brethren. I may also frankly admit embarrassment arising from certain views stated in dissenting opinions heretofore delivered by me which did not, at the time, meet the approval of my brethren and which I do not now myself entertain. What I shall say in this opinion will be in substantial accord with what the court has heretofore decided, while the opinion of the court departs, as I think, from principles previously announced by it upon full consideration. I propose to adhere to former decisions of the court, whatever may have been once my opinion as to certain aspects of this general question.

The plaintiffs in the suit referred to, Perkins and Shepard, were shareholders of the Northern Pacific Railway Company and citizens, respectively, of Iowa and Minnesota. The defendants were the railway company, Edward T. Young, attorney-general of Minnesota, the several members of the State railroad and warehouse commission, and certain persons who were shippers of freight over the lines of that railway.

The general object of the suit was to prevent compliance with the provisions of certain acts of the Minnesota legislature and certain orders of the State railroad and warehouse commisssion, indicating the rates which the State permits to be charged for the transportation of passengers and commodities upon railroads within its limits; also to prevent shippers from bringing actions against the railway company to enforce those acts and orders.

The bill, among other things, prayed that Edward T. Young, "as attorney-general of the State of Minnesota," and the members of the State railroad and warehouse commission (naming them) be enjoined from all attempts to compel the railway company to put in force the rates or any of them prescribed by said orders, and "from taking any action, step, or proceeding against said railway company, or any of its officers, directors, agents, or employees, to enforce any penalties or remedies for the violation by said railway company of said orders or either of them;" and that said Young, "as attorney-general," be enjoined from taking any action, step, or proceeding against the railway company, its officers, agents, or employees, to enforce the penalties and remedies specified in those acts.

The court gave a temporary injunction as prayed for. The attorney-general of Minnesota appeared specially and, without submitting to or acknowledging the jurisdiction of the court, moved to dismiss the suit as to him, upon the ground that the State had not consented to be sued, and also because the bill was exhibited against him "as, and only as, the attorney-general of the State of Minnesota," to restrain him, by injunction, from exercising the discretion vested in him to commence appropriate actions, on behalf of the State, to enforce or to test the validity of its laws. He directly raised the question that the suit as to him, in his official capacity, was one against the State, in violation of the eleventh amendment.

In response to an order to show cause why the injunction asked for should not be granted the attorney-general also appeared specially and urged like objections to the suit against him in the circuit court.

After hearing the parties the court made an order September 23, 1907, whereby the railway company, its officers, directors, agents, servants, and employees, were enjoined until the further order of the court from publishing, adopting, or putting into effect the tariffs, rates, or charges specified in the act of April 18, 1907. The court likewise enjoined the defendant, Young, "as attorney-general of the State of Minnesota," from "taking or instituting any action, suit, step, or proceeding to enforce the penalties and remedies specified in said act or either thereof, or to compel obedience to said act or compliance therewith or any part thereof." A like injunction was granted against the defendant shippers.

On the next day, September 24, 1907, the State of Minnesota, "on the relation of Edward T. Young, attorney-general," commenced an action in one of its own courts against the Northern Pacific Railway Company—the only relief sought being a mandamus ordering the company to adopt, publish, keep for public inspection, and put into effect, as the rates and charges to be maintained for the transportation of freight between stations in Minnesota, those named and specified in what is known as chapter 232 of the session laws of Minnesota for 1907. That was the act which it was the object of the Perkins-Shepard suit in the Federal court to strike down and nullify. An alternative writ of mandamus, such as the State asked, was issued by the State court.

The institution, in the State court, by the State, on the relation of its attorney-general, of the mandamus proceeding against the railway company having been brought to the attention of the Federal circuit court, a rule was issued against the defendant Young to show cause why he should not be punished as for contempt. Answering that rule, he alleged, among other things, that the mandamus proceeding was brought by and on behalf of the State, through him as its attorney-general; that in every way possible he had objected to such jurisdiction on the ground that the action was commenced against him solely as the attorney-general for Minnesota in order to prevent him from instituting in the proper courts civil actions for and in the name of the State to enforce or test the validity of its laws; that there is no other action or proceeding pending or contemplated by this defendant against said railway company, except said proceedings in mandamus hereinbefore referred to. Defendant expressly disclaimed any intention to treat this court with disrespect in the commencement of the proceedings referred to, "but believing that the decision of this court in this action, holding that it had jurisdiction to enjoin this defendant, as such attorney-general, from performing his discretionary official duties, was in conflict with the eleventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States, as the same has been interpreted and applied by the United States Supreme Court, defendant believed it to be his duty as such attorney-general to commence said mandamus proceedings for and in behalf of the State, and it was in this belief that said proceedings were commenced solely for the purpose of enforcing the said law of the State of Minnesota."

The rule was heard, and the attorney-general was held to be in contempt, the order of the Federal court being: "Ordered further, that said Edward T. Young forthwith dismiss or cause to be dismissed the suit of the State of Minnesota on the relation of Edward T. Young, attorney-general, plaintiff, v. Northern Pacific Railway Company, defendant, heretofore instituted by him in the district court of the county of Ramsey, second judicial district, State of Minnesota. Ordered further, that for his said contempt said Edward T. Young be fined the sum of $100 and stand committed in the custody of the marshal of this court until the same be paid, and until he purge himself of his contempt by dismissing or causing to be dismissed said suit last herein mentioned."

The present proceeding was commenced by an original application by Young to this court for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner, in his application, proceeds upon the ground that he is held in custody in violation of the Constitution of the United States. The petition set out all the steps taken in the suit in the Federal court, alleging among other things: "That your petitioner's office as attorney-general of the State of Minnesota is established and provided for by the constitution of said State, section 1 of Article V thereof providing as follows, to wit: 'The executive department shall consist of a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, auditor, treasurer, and attorney-general, who shall be chosen by the electors of the State.' That neither by statute nor otherwise is your petitioner charged with any special duty of a ministerial character in the doing or not doing of which said complainants in the said bill of complaint or the said Northern Pacific Railway Company had any legal right, and that whatever duties your petitioner had or has with respect to the several matters complained of in the said bill of complaint, are of an executive and discretionary nature. That in no case could your petitioner, even though it was his intention so to do, which it was not, deprive the said complainants or the said Northern Pacific Railway Company, or either of them, of any property, nor could he trespass upon their rights in any particular, and that all he could do as attorney-general as aforesaid and all that it was his duty to do in that capacity, and all that he intended to do or would do, was to commence formal judicial proceedings in the appropriate court of Minnesota against the said Northern Pacific Railway Company, its officers, agents, and employees, to compel the said company, its agents and servants, to adopt and put in force the schedule of freight rates, tariffs, and charges prescribed by said chapter 232, laws 1907, of the State of Minnesota." He renewed the objection that the suit instituted by Perkins and Shepard, in so far as the same is against him, was a suit against the State to prevent his commencing the proposed action in the name of the State, and was in restraint of the State itself, "and that the said suit is one against the said State in violation of the eleventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and that therefore the same is and was, so far as your petitioner is concerned, beyond the jurisdiction of the said circuit court," etc.

This statement will sufficiently indicate the nature of the question to be now examined upon its merits.

Let it be observed that the suit instituted by Perkins and Shepard in the circuit court of the United States was, as to the defendant, Young, one against him as, and only because he was, attorney-general of Minnesota. No relief was sought against him individually but only in his capacity as attorney-general. And the manifest, indeed the avowed and admitted, object of seeking such relief was to tie the hands of the State so that it could not in any manner or by any mode of proceeding, in its own courts, test the validity of the statutes and orders in question. It would therefore seem clear that within the true meaning of the eleventh amendment the suit brought in the Federal court was one, in legal effect, against the State—as much so as if the State had been formally named on the record as a party—and therefore it was a suit to which, under the amendment, so far as the State or its attorney-general was concerned, the judicial power of the United States did not and could not extend. If this proposition be sound, it will follow—indeed, it is conceded that if, so far as relief is sought against the attorney-general of Minnesota, this be a suit against the State—then the order of the Federal court enjoining that officer from taking any action, suit, step, or proceeding to compel the railway company to obey the Minnesota statute was beyond the jurisdiction of that court and wholly void; in which case that officer was at liberty to proceed in the discharge of his official duties as defined by the laws of the State, and the order adjudging him to be in contempt for bringing the mandamus proceedings in the State court was a nullity.

The fact that the Federal circuit court had, prior to the institution of the mandamus suit in the State court, preliminarily (but not finally) held the statutes of Minnesota and the orders of its railroad and warehouse commission in question to be in violation of the Constitution of the United States, was no reason why that court should have laid violent hands upon the attorney-general of Minnesota and by its orders have deprived the State of the services of its constitutional law officer in its own courts. Yet that is what was done by the Federal circuit court; for the intangible thing called a State, however extensive its powers, can never appear or be represented or known in any court in a litigated case except by and through its officers. When, therefore, the Federal court forbade the defendant, Young, as attorney-general of Minnesota, from taking any action, suit, step, or proceeding whatever looking to the enforcement of the statutes in question, it said in effect to the State of Minnesota: "It is true that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to its people, and it is true that under the Constitution the judicial power of the United States does not extend to any suit brought against a State by a citizen of another State or by a citizen or subject of a foreign state, yet the Federal court adjudges that you, the State, although a sovereign for many important governmental purposes, shall not appear in your own courts, by your law officers, with the view of enforcing, or even for determining the validity of, the State enactments which the Federal court has, upon a preliminary hearing, declared to be in violation of the Constitution of the United States."

This principle, if firmly established, would work a radical change in our governmental system. It would inaugurate a new era in the American judicial system and in the relations of the National and State governments. It would enable the subordinate Federal courts to supervise and control the official action of the States as if they were "dependencies" or provinces. It would place the States of the Union in a condition of inferiority never dreamed of when the Constitution was adopted or when the eleventh amendment was made a part of the supreme law of the land. I can not suppose that the great men who framed the Constitution ever thought the time would come when a subordinate Federal court, having no power to compel a State, in its corporate capacity, to appear before it as a litigant, would yet assume to deprive a State of the right to be represented in its own courts by its regular law officer. That is what the court below did as to Minnesota, when it adjudged that the appearance of the defendant, Young, in the State court, as the attorney-general of Minnesota representing his State as its chief law officer, was a contempt of the authority of the Federal court, punishable by fine and imprisonment. Too little consequence has been attached to the fact that the courts of the States are under an obligation equally strong with that resting upon the courts of the Union to respect and enforce the provisions of the Federal Constitution as the supreme law of the land and to guard rights secured or guaranteed by that instrument. We must assume—a decent respect for the States require us to assume—that the State courts will enforce every right secured by the Constitution. If they fail to do so, the party complaining has a clear remedy for the protection of his rights; for he can come by writ of error, in an orderly, judicial way from the highest court of the State to this tribunal for redress in respect of every right granted or secured by that instrument and denied by the State court. The State courts, it should be remembered, have jurisdiction concurrent with the courts of the United States of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or equity, involving a prescribed amount, arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States. (25 Stat., 434.) And this court has said: "A State court of original jurisdiction, having the parties before it, may, consistently with existing Federal legislation determine cases at law or in equity arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States or involving rights dependent upon such Constitution or laws. Upon the State courts, equally with the courts of the Union, rests the obligation to guard, enforce, and protect every right granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, whenever those rights are involved in any suit or proceeding before them; for the judges of the State courts are required to take an oath to support that Constitution, and they are bound by it, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made under their authority, as the supreme law of the land, 'anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.' If they fail therein, and withhold or deny rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States, the party aggrieved may bring the case from the highest court of the State in which the question could be decided to this court for final and conclusive determination." (Robb v. Connolly, 111 U. S., 624, 637.) So that an order of the Federal court preventing the State from having the services of its attorney-general in one of its own courts, except at the risk of his being fined and arrested, can not be justified upon the ground that the question of constitutional law involved in the enforcement of the statute in question was beyond the competency of a State court to consider and determine, primarily, as between the parties before it in a suit brought by the State itself.

At the argument of this case counsel for the railway company insisted that the provisions of the act in question were so drastic that they could be enforced by the State in its own courts with such persistency and in such a manner as, in a very brief period, to have the railway officers and agents all in jail, the business of the company destroyed, and its property confiscated by heavy and successive penalties, before a final judicial decision as to the constitutionality of the act could be obtained. I infer from some language in the court's opinion that these apprehensions are shared by some of my brethren. And this supposed danger to the railway company and its shareholders seems to have been the basis of the action of the Federal circuit court when, by its order directed against the attorney-general of Minnesota, it practically excluded the State from its own courts in respect of the issues here involved. But really no such question as to the State statute is here involved or need be now considered; for it can not possibly arise on the hearing of the present application of that officer for discharge on habeas corpus. The only question now before this court is whether the suit by Perkins and Shepard in the Federal court was not, upon its face, as to the relief sought against the attorney-general of Minnesota, a suit against the State. Stated in another form, the question is whether that court may, by operating upon that officer in his official capacity, by means of fine and imprisonment, prevent the State from being represented by its law officer in one of its own courts? If the Federal court could not thus put manacles upon the State so as to prevent it from being represented by its attorney-general in its own court and from having the State court pass upon the validity of the State enactment in question in the Perkins-Shepard suit, that is an end to this habeas corpus proceeding, and the attorney-general of Minnesota should be discharged by order of this court from custody.

It is to be observed that when the State was in effect prohibited by the order of the Federal court from appearing in its own courts there was no danger, absolutely none whatever, from anything that the attorney-general had ever done or proposed to do, that the property of the railway company would be confiscated and its officers and agents imprisoned, beyond the power of that company to stay any wrong done by bringing to this court, in regular order, any final judgment of the State court, in the mandamus suit, which may have been in derogation of a Federal right. When the attorney-general instituted the mandamus proceeding in the State court against the railway company, there was in force, it must not be forgotten, an order of injunction by the Federal court which prevented that company from obeying the State law. There was consequently no danger from that direction. Besides, the mandamus proceeding was not instituted for the recovery of any of the penalties prescribed by the State law, and therefore no judgment in that case could operate directly upon the property of the railway company or upon the persons of its officers or agents. The attorney-general in his response to the rule against him assured the Federal court that he did not contemplate any proceeding whatever against the railway company except the one in mandamus. Suppose the mandamus case had been finally decided in the State court, the way was open for the railway company to preserve any question it made as to its rights under the Constitution, and, in the event of a decision adverse to it in that court, at once to carry the case to the highest court of Minnesota and thence by a writ of error bring it to this court. That course would have served to determine every question of constitutional law raised by the suit in the Federal court in an orderly way without trampling upon the State, and without interfering, in the meantime, with the operation of the railway property in the accustomed way. Instead of adopting that course—so manifestly consistent with the dignity and authority of both the Federal and State judicial tribunals—the Federal court practically closed the State courts against the State itself when it adjudged that the attorney-general, without regard to the wishes of the governor of Minnesota, and without reference to his duties as prescribed by the laws of that State, should stand in the custody of the marshal, unless he dismissed the mandamus suit. If the Federal court could thus prohibit the law officer of the State from representing it in a suit brought in the State court, why might not the bill in the Federal court be so amended that that court could reach all the district attorneys in Minnesota and forbid them from bringing to the attention of grand juries and the State courts violations of the State act by the railway company? And if a grand jury was about to inquire into the acts of the railway company in respect of the matter of its rates, why may not the Federal court, proceeding upon the same grounds on which it has moved against the attorney-general, enjoin the finding or returning of indictments against the railway company? If an indictment was returned against the railway company, and was about to be tried by a petit jury, why could not the Federal court, upon the principles now announced, forbid the jury to proceed against the railway company, and, if it did, punish every petit juryman as for contempt of court? Indeed, why may it not lay its hands on the governor of the State and forbid him from appealing to the courts of Minnesota in the name of the State to test the validity of the act in question? And why may not the Federal court lay its hands even upon the judge of the State court itself whenever it proceeds against the railway company under the State law?

The subject-matter of these questions have evidently been considered by this court, and the startling consequences that would result from an affirmative answer to them have not been overlooked; for, in its opinion, I find these observations: "It is proper to add that the right to enjoin an individual, even though a State official, from commencing suits under circumstances already stated, does not include the power to restrain a court from acting in any case brought before it, either of a civil or criminal nature, nor does it include power to prevent any investigation or action by a grand jury. The latter body is part of the machinery of a criminal court, and an injunction against a State court would be a violation of the whole scheme of our Government. If an injunction against an individual is disobeyed, and he commences proceedings before a grand jury or in a court, such disobedience is personal only, and the court or jury can proceed without incurring any penalty on that account. The difference between the power to enjoin an individual from doing certain things and the power to enjoin courts from proceeding in their own way to exercise jurisdiction is plain, and no power to do the latter exists because of a power to do the former." If an order of the Federal court forbidding a State court or its grand jury from attempting to enforce a State enactment would be "a violation of the whole scheme of our Government," it is difficult to perceive why an order of that court, forbidding the chief law officer and all the district attorneys of a State to represent it in the courts in a particular case, and practically, in that way, closing the doors of the State court against the State, would not also be inconsistent with the whole scheme of our Government, and therefore beyond the power of the court to make.

Whether the Minnesota statutes are or are not violative of the Constitution is not, as already suggested, a question in this habeas corpus proceeding. I do not, therefore, stop to consider whether those statutes are repugnant to the Constitution upon the ground that by their necessary operation, when enforced, they will prevent the railway company from contesting their validity, or upon the ground that they are confiscatory and therefore obnoxious to the requirement of due process of law. While the argument at the bar in support of each of these propositions was confessedly of great force and persuasiveness, those points need not be now examined. I express no opinion about them. Their soundness may, however, be conceded for the purposes of this discussion. Indeed, it may be assumed for the purposes of this discussion that these State enactments are harsh and intemperate, and, in some of their features, invalid. But those questions are wholly apart from the present proceeding. If we now consider them, we must go out of our way in order to do so. We have no evidence in this proceeding as to the effect which the statutes, if enforced, would have upon the value either of the railway property or of the bonds or stocks of the railway company. The question of their validity has not been finally decided by the circuit court, and we have not before us even the evidence upon which its preliminary injunction was based. The essential and only question now before us or that need be decided is whether an order by the Federal court which prevents the State from being represented in its own courts, by its chief law officer, upon an issue involving the constitutional validity of certain State enactments, does not make a suit against the State within the meaning of the eleventh amendment. If it be a suit of that kind, then, it is conceded, the circuit court was without jurisdiction to fine and imprison the petitioner and he must be discharged, whatever our views may be as to the validity of those State enactments. This must necessarily be so unless the amendment has less force and a more restricted meaning now than it had at the time of its adoption, and unless a suit against the attorney-general of a State, in his official capacity, is not one against a State under the eleventh amendment when its determination depends upon a question of constitutional power or right under the fourteenth amendment. In that view I can not concur. In my opinion, the eleventh amendment has not been modified in the slightest degree as to its scope or meaning by the fourteenth amendment, and a suit which, in its essence, is one against the State remains one of that character and is forbidden even when brought to strike down a State statute alleged to be in violation of that clause of the fourteenth amendment forbidding the deprivation, by a State, of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. If a suit be commenced in a State court, and involves a right secured by the Federal Constitution, the way is open under our incomparable judicial system to protect that right, first, by the judgment of the State court, and ultimately by the judgment of this court, upon writ of error. But such right can not be protected by means of a suit which, at the outset, is directly or in legal effect one against the State whose action is alleged to be illegal. That mode of redress is absolutely forbidden by the eleventh amendment and can not be made legal by mere construction or by any consideration of the consequences that may follow from the operation of the statute. Parties can not, in any case, obtain redress by a suit against the State. Such has been the uniform ruling in this court, and it is most unfortunate that it is now declared to be competent for a Federal circuit court, by exerting its authority over the chief law officer of the State, without the consent of the State to exclude the State, in its sovereign capacity, from its own courts when seeking to have the ruling of those courts as to its powers under its own statutes. Surely the right of a State to invoke the jurisdiction of its own courts is not less than the right of individuals to invoke the jurisdiction of a Federal court. The preservation of the dignity and sovereignty of the States, within the limits of their constitutional powers, is of the last importance and vital to the preservation of our system of government. The courts should not permit themselves to be driven by the hardships, real or supposed, of particular cases to accomplish results, even if they be just results, in a mode forbidden by the fundamental law. The country should never be allowed to think that the Constitution can, in any case, be evaded or amended by mere judicial interpretation, or that its behests may be nullified by an ingenious construction of its provisions.

The importance of the question under consideration is a sufficient justification for such a reference to the authorities as will indicate the precise grounds on which this court has oftentimes proceeded when determining what is and what is not a suit against a State within the meaning of the eleventh amendment. All the cases agree in declaring the incapacity of a Federal court to exercise jurisdiction over a State as a party. But assaults upon the eleventh amendment have oftenest been made in cases in which the effort has been, without making the State a formal party, to control the acts of its officers and agents, by such orders directed to them as will accomplish by indirection the same results that could be accomplished by a suit directly against the State if such a suit were possible. It will be well to look at some of the principal adjudged cases.

The general question was examined in Cunningham v. Macon and Brunswick Railroad Company (109 U. S., 446–451), where the court said that it was conceded in all the cases, and "may be accepted as a point of departure unquestioned, that neither a State nor the United States can be sued as defendant in any court in this country without their consent, except in the limited class of cases in which a State may be made a party in the Supreme Court of the United States by virtue of the original jurisdiction conferred on this court by the Constitution." The court has not in any case departed from this constitutional principle. In Pennoyer v. McConnaughy (140 U. S., 1, 9) it said that "this immunity of a State from suit is absolute and unqualified, and the constitutional provision securing it is not to be so construed as to place the State within the reach of the process of the court. Accordingly it is equally well settled that a suit against the officers of a State to compel them to do the acts which constitute a performance by it of its contracts is, in effect, a suit against the State itself." In Cunningham v. Macon and Brunswick Railroad Company, just cited, the distinction was drawn between a suit in which the State is the real party in interest, although not technically a party on the record, and one in which "an individual is sued in tort for some act injurious to another in regard to person or property, to which his defense is that he has acted under the orders of the government," in which last case, the court observed, the defendant "is not sued as, or because he is, the officer of the government, but as an individual, and the court is not ousted of jurisdiction because he asserts authority as such officer." Let it not be forgotten that the defendant Young was sued not as an individual or because he had any personal interest in these matters, but as, and solely because he is, an officer of the State charged with the performance of certain public duties.

In Hagood v. Southern (117 U. S., 52, 67, 68), which involved the validity of certain scrip alleged to have been issued by the State of South Carolina, it appeared that the State having denied its obligation to pay, the plaintiff sought relief by simply suing certain State officers, as such, without making the State a formal party. The court said: "These suits are accurately described as bills for the specific performance of a contract between the complainants and the State of South Carolina, who are the only parties to it. But to these bills the State is not in name made a party defendant, though leave is given to it to become such if it chooses; and, except with that consent, it could not be brought before the court and made to appear and defend. And yet it is the actual party to the alleged contract the performance of which is decreed, the one required to perform the decree, and the only party by whom it can be performed. Though not nominally a party to the record, it is the real and only party in interest, the nominal defendants being the officers and agents of the State, having no personal interest in the subject-matter of the suit and defending only as representing the State. And the things required by the decrees to be done and performed by them are the very things which, when done and performed, constitute a performance of the alleged contract by the State. The State is not only the real party to the controversy, but the real party against which relief is sought by the suit, and the suit is, therefore, substantially within the prohibition of the eleventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that 'the judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State.'" Again: "If this case is not within the class of those forbidden by the constitutional guaranty to the States of immunity from suits in Federal tribunals, it is difficult to conceive the frame of one which would be. If the State is named as a defendant, it can only be reached either by mesne or final process through its officers and agents, and a judgment against it could neither be obtained nor enforced, except as the public conduct and government of the ideal political body called a State could be reached and affected through its official representatives. A judgment against these latter, in their official and representative capacity, commanding them to perform official functions on behalf of the State according to the dictates and decrees of the court, is, if anything can be, a judicial proceeding against the State itself. If not, it may well be asked, What would constitute such a proceeding? In the present cases the decrees were not only against the defendants in their official capacity, but, that there might be no mistake as to the nature and extent of the duty to be performed, also against their successors in office." Is it to be said that an order requiring the attorney-general of a State to perform certain official functions on behalf of the State is a suit against the State, while an order forbidding him, as attorney-general, not to perform an official function on behalf of the State is not a suit against the State?

The leading case upon the general subject, and one very similar in many important particulars to the present one, is In re Ayers. (123 U. S., 443, 496, 497, 505.) The facts in that case were briefly these: The legislature of Virginia, in 1887, passed an act which holders of sundry bonds and tax-receivable coupons of that Commonwealth alleged to be in violation of their rights under the Constitution of the United States. They instituted a suit in equity in the circuit court of the United States against the attorney-general and auditor of Virginia, and against the treasurers and Commonwealth attorneys of counties, cities, and towns in Virginia, the relief asked being a decree enjoining and restraining the said State officers, and each of them, from bringing or commencing any suit provided for by the above act of 1887, or from doing anything to put that act into operation. The circuit court entered an order enjoining the attorney-general of Virginia and each and all the State officers named "from bringing or commencing any suit against any person who has tendered the State of Virginia tax-receivable coupons in payment of taxes due to said State, as provided for and directed by the act of the legislature of Virginia, approved May 12, 1887." Subsequently the circuit court of the United States was informed that the attorney-general of Virginia had disobeyed its order of injunction. Thereupon that officer was ruled to show cause why he should not be fined and imprisoned. He responded to the rule, admitting that after being served with the injunction he had instituted a suit, in the State circuit court, against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to recover taxes due the State, and alleging "that he instituted the said suit because he was thereunto required by the act of the general assembly of Virginia aforesaid, and because he believed this court had no jurisdiction whatever to award the injunction violated." He disclaimed any intention to treat the court with disrespect, and stated that he had been actuated alone by the desire to have the law properly administered. He was, nevertheless, adjudged guilty of contempt, was required forthwith to dismiss the suit he had brought, was fined $500 for contempt of court, and committed to the custody of the marshal until the fine was paid and until he purged himself of his contempt by dismissing the suit in the State court. The attorney-general then applied directly to this court for a writ of habeas corpus, which was granted, and upon hearing he was released by this court from custody. The order for his discharge recited that the suit in which the injunctions were granted was "in substance and in law a suit against the State of Virginia," and "within the prohibition of the eleventh amendment to the Constitution;" that it was one "to which the judicial power of the United States does not extend;" that the circuit court was without jurisdiction to entertain it; that all its proceedings in the exercise of jurisdiction were null and void; that it had no authority or power to adjudge the attorney-general in contempt, and that his imprisonment was without authority of law.

In the opinion in the Ayers case the court said: "It follows, therefore, in the present case, that the personal act of the petitioners sought to be restrained by the order of the circuit court, reduced to the mere bringing of an action in the name of and for the State against taxpayers, who, although they may have tendered tax-receivable coupons, are charged as delinquents, can not be alleged against them as an individual act in violation of any legal or contract rights of such taxpayers." Again: "The relief sought is against the defendants, not in their individual but in their representative capacity as officers of the State of Virginia. The acts sought to be restrained are the bringing of suits by the State of Virginia in its own name and for its own use. If the State had been made a defendant to this bill by name, charged according to the allegations it now contains—supposing that such a suit could be maintained—it would have been subject to the jurisdiction of the court by process served upon its governor and attorney-general, according to the precedents in such cases. (New Jersey v. New York, 5 Pet., 284, 288, 290; Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How., 66, 96, 97; Rule 5 of 1884, 108 U. S., 574.) If a decree could have been rendered enjoining the State from bringing suits against its taxpayers, it would have operated upon the State only through the officers who by law were required to represent it in bringing such suits, viz, the present defendants, its attorney-general, and the Commonwealth's attorneys for the several counties. For a breach of such an injunction, these officers would be amenable to the court as proceeding in contempt of its authority, and would be liable to punishment thereof by attachment and imprisonment. The nature of the case, as supposed, is identical with that of the case as actually presented in the bill, with the single exception that the State is not named as a defendant. How else can the State be forbidden by judicial process to bring actions in its name, except by constraining the conduct of its officers, its attorneys, and its agents? And if all such officers, attorneys, and agents are personally subjected to the process of the court, so as to forbid their acting in its behalf, how can it be said that the State itself is not subjected to the jurisdiction of the court as an actual and real defendant?"

Further: "The very object and purpose of the eleventh amendment were to prevent the indignity of subjecting a State to the coercive process of judicial tribunals at the instance of private parties. It was thought to be neither becoming nor convenient that the several States of the Union, invested with that large residuum of sovereignty which had not been delegated to the United States, should be summoned as defendants to answer the complaints of private persons, whether citizens of other States or aliens, or that the course of their public policy and the administration of their public affairs should be subject to and controlled by the members of judicial tribunals without their consent and in favor of individual interests. To secure the manifest purposes of the constitutional exemption guaranteed by the eleventh amendment requires that it should be interpreted not literally and too narrowly, but fairly, and with such breadth and largeness as effectually to accomplish the substance of its purpose. In this spirit it must be held to cover not only suits brought against a State by name, but those also against its officers, agents, and representatives where the State, though not named as such, is nevertheless the only real party against which alone in fact the relief is asked, and against which the judgment or decree effectively operates. But this is not intended in any way to impinge upon the principle which justifies suits against individual defendants, who, under color of the authority of unconstitutional legislation by the State, are guilty of personal trespasses and wrongs, nor to forbid suits against officers in their official capacity either to arrest or direct their official action by injunction or mandamus, where such suits are authorized by law, and the act to be done or omitted is purely ministerial, in the performance or omission of which the plaintiff has a legal interest."

It is said that the Ayers case is not applicable here, because the orders made by the Federal circuit court had for their object to compel Virginia to perform its contract with bondholders, which is not this case. But that difference between the Ayers case and this case can not affect the principle involved. The proceeding against the attorney-general of Virginia had for its object to compel, by indirection, the performance of the contract which that Commonwealth was alleged to have made with bondholders—such performance, on the part of the State, to be effected by means of orders in a Federal circuit court directly controlling the official action of that officer. The proceeding in the Perkins-Shepard suit against the attorney-general of Minnesota had for its object, by means of orders in a Federal circuit court, directed to that officer, to control the action of that State in reference to the enforcement of certain statutes by judicial proceedings commenced in its own courts. The relief sought in each case was to control the State by controlling the conduct of its law officer, against its will. I can not conceive how the proceeding against the attorney-general of Virginia could be deemed a suit against that State, and yet the proceeding against the attorney-general of Minnesota is not to be deemed a suit against Minnesota, when the object and effect of the latter proceeding was, beyond all question, to shut that State entirely out of its own courts, and prevent it through its law officer from invoking their jurisdiction in a special matter of public concern, involving official duty, about which the State desired to know the views of its own judiciary. In my opinion the decision in the Ayers case determines this case for the petitioner.

More directly in point, perhaps, for the petitioner, Young, is the case of Fitts v. McGhee (172 U. S., 516, 528, 529, 530). That suit was brought by the receivers of a railroad company against the governor and attorney-general of Alabama. Its object was to prevent the enforcement of the provisions of an Alabama statute prescribing the maximum rates of toll to be charged on a certain bridge across the Tennessee River. The statute imposed a penalty for each time that the owners, lessees, or operators of the bridge demanded or received any higher rate of toll than was prescribed by it. The relief asked was an injunction prohibiting the governor and attorney-general of the State and all other persons from instituting any proceeding against the complainants, or either of them, to enforce the statute. An injunction, as prayed for, was granted. In the progress of the cause the solicitor of the district in which the case was pending was made a defendant and the injunction was extended to him. By amended pleadings it was made to appear that the tollgate keepers at the public crossing of the bridge were indicted for collecting tolls in violation of the statute. In the progress of the cause the plaintiffs dismissed the case as to the State, and the cause was discontinued as to the governor. But the case was heard upon the motion to dismiss the bill upon the ground that the suit was one against the State in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

After stating the principles settled in the Ayers case and in other cases this court said: "If these principles be applied in the present case there is no escape from the conclusion that, although the State of Alabama was dismissed as a party defendant, this suit against its officers is really one against the State. As a State can act only by its officers, an order restraining those officers from taking any steps, by means of judicial proceedings, in execution of the statute of February 9, 1895, is one which restrains the State itself, and the suit is consequently as much against the State as if the State were named as a party defendant on the record. If the individual defendants only held possession or were about to take possession of, or to commit any trespass upon, any property belonging to or under the control of the plaintiffs, in violation of the latter's constitutional rights, they could not resist the judicial determination, in a suit against them, of the question of the right to such possession by simply asserting that they held or were entitled to hold the property in their capacity as officers of the State. In the case supposed, they would be compelled to make good the State's claim to the property, and could not shield themselves against suit because of their official character. (Tindal v. Wesley, 167 U. S., 204, 222.) No such case is before us." Again, in the same case: "It is to be observed that neither the attorney-general of Alabama nor the solicitor of the eleventh judicial circuit of the State appear to have been charged by law with any special duty in connection with the act of February 9, 1895. In support of the contention that the present suit is not one against the State, reference was made by counsel to several cases, among which were Poindexter v. Greenhow (114 U. S., 270), Allen v. Baltimore and Ohio Railroad (114 U. S., 311), Pennoyer v. McConnaughy (140 U. S., 1), In re Tyler (149 U. S., 164), Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (154 U. S., 362, 388), Scott v. Donald (165 U. S., 58), and Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S., 466). Upon examination it will be found that the defendants in each of those cases were officers of the State, especially charged with the execution of a State enactment alleged to be unconstitutional, but under the authority of which, it was averred, they were committing or were about to commit some specific wrong or trespass to the injury of the plaintiff's rights. There is a wide difference between a suit against individuals, holding official positions under a State, to prevent them, under the sanction of an unconstitutional statute, from committing by some positive act a wrong or trespass, and a suit against officers of a State merely to test the constitutionality of a State statute, in the enforcement of which those officers will act only by formal judicial proceedings in the courts of the State. In the present case, as we have said, neither of the State officers named held any special relation to the particular statute alleged to be unconstitutional. They were not expressly directed to see its enforcement. If, because they were law officers of the State, a case could be made for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of the statute, by an injunction suit brought against them, then the constitutionality of every act passed by the legislature could be tested by a suit against the governor and attorney-general, based upon the theory that the former as the executive of the State was, in a general sense, charged with the execution of all its laws, and the latter, as attorney-general, might represent the State in litigation involving the enforcement of its statutes. That would be a very convenient way for obtaining a speedy judicial determination of questions of constitutional law which may be raised by individuals, but it is a mode which can not be applied to the States of the Union consistently with the fundamental principle that they can not, without their assent, be brought into any court at the suit of private persons. If their officers commit acts of trespass or wrong to the citizen, they may be individually proceeded against for such trespasses or wrong. Under the view we take of the question, the citizen is not without effective remedy when proceeded against under a legislative enactment void for repugnancy to the supreme law of the land; for, whatever the form of proceeding against him, he can make his defense upon the ground that the statute is unconstitutional and void. And that question can be ultimately brought to this court for final determination." I am unable to distinguish that case, in principle, from the one now before us. The Fitts case is not overruled, but is, I fear, frittered away or put out of sight by unwarranted distinctions.

Two cases in this court are much relied on to support the proposition that the Perkins-Shepard suit in the circuit court is not a suit against the State. I refer to Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (154 U. S., 362) and Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S., 466, 472). But each of those cases differs in material respects from the one instituted by Perkins and Shepard in the court below. In the Reagan case it appears that the very act, under which the railroad commission proceeded, authorized the railroad company, or any interested party, if dissatisfied with the action of the commission in establishing rates, to bring suit against that commission in any court, in a named county, with right to appeal to a higher court. This court when combating the suggestion that only the State court had jurisdiction to proceed against the commission, and give relief in respect of the rates it established, said: "It may be laid down as a general proposition that, whenever a citizen of a State can go into the courts of a State to defend his property against the illegal acts of its officers, a citizen of another State may invoke the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to maintain a like defense. A State can not tie up a citizen of another State, having property rights within its territory invaded by unauthorized acts of its own officers, to suits for redress in its own courts. Given a case where a suit can be maintained in the courts of the State to protect property rights, a citizen of another State may invoke the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. * * * It comes, therefore, within the very terms of the act. It can not be doubted that a State, like any other government, can waive exemption from suit." The declaration of the court in the Reagan case, that that suit was not, within the true meaning of the eleventh amendment, to be regarded as a suit against the State, must therefore be taken in connection with the declaration in the same case that the State having consented that the commission might be sued in one of its own courts, in respect of the rates established by the statute, must be taken to have waived its immunity from suit in the circuit court of the United States sitting in Texas. In Smyth v. Ames, above cited, which was a suit in a circuit court of the United States, involving the constitutional validity of certain rates established for railroads in Nebraska, it appeared that the statute expressly authorized any railroad company claiming that the rates were unreasonable to bring an action against the State before the Supreme Court in the name of the railroad company or companies bringing the same. Thus the State of Nebraska waived its immunity from suit, and having authorized a suit against itself in one of its courts, in respect of the rates there in question, it could not, according to the decision in the Reagan case, deny its liability to like suit in a court of the United States. It is true that this court, in its opinion in Smyth v. Ames, did not lay any special stress on the fact that Nebraska, by the statute, agreed that it might be sued, but it took especial care in its extended statement of the case to bring out that fact. Its silence on that point is not extraordinary, in view of the fact, as appears from the opinion of this court, that the question whether that suit was to be deemed one against the State was not discussed at the bar by the Nebraska State board. We there quoted from the Reagan case these words: "Whenever a citizen of a State can go into the courts of a State to defend his property against the illegal acts of its officers, a citizen of another State may invoke the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to maintain a like defense. A State can not tie up a citizen of another State, having property rights within its territory invaded by unauthorized acts of its own officers, to suits for redress in its own courts." That the Reagan and Smyth cases did not go as far as is now claimed for them is made clear by the later case of Fitts v. McGhee, already referred to, in which the doctrines of In re Ayers were reaffirmed and applied.

We may refer in this connection to Gunter v. Atlantic Coast Line (200 U. S., 273, 291), in which case one of the points made was that the circuit court of the United States had no power to restrain the attorney-general of South Carolina and the counsel associated with him from prosecuting in the State courts actions authorized by the laws of the State, and hence that the court erred in awarding an injunction against said officers. This court said: "Support for the proposition is rested upon the terms of the eleventh amendment and the provisions of section 720 of the Revised Statutes, forbidding the granting of a writ by any court of the United States to stay proceedings in any court of a State, except in cases where such injunction may be authorized by any law relating to proceedings in bankruptcy. The soundness of the doctrine relied upon is undoubted. (In re Ayers, 123 U. S., 443; Fitts v. McGhee, 172 U. S., 516.) The difficulty is that the doctrine is inapplicable to this case. Section 720 of the Revised Statutes was originally adopted in 1793, whilst the eleventh amendment was in process of formation in Congress for submission to the States, and long, therefore, before the ratification of that amendment. The restrictions embodied in the section were, therefore, but a partial accomplishment of the more comprehensive result effectuated by the prohibitions of the eleventh amendment. Both the statute and the amendment relate to the power of courts of the United States to deal, against the will and consent of a State, with controversies between it and individuals. None of the prohibitions, therefore, of the amendment or of the statute relate to the power of a Federal court to administer relief in causes where jurisdiction as to a State and its officers has been acquired as a result of the voluntary action of the State in submitting its rights to judicial determination. To confound the two classes of cases is but to overlook the distinction which exists between the power of a court to deal with a subject over which it has jurisdiction and its want of authority to entertain a controversy as to which jurisdiction is not possessed."

Counsel for the railway company placed some reliance on Pennoyer v. McConnaughy (140 U. S., 1, 18), in which the previous cases on the general subject of suits against the States were classified. That case was a suit in equity against certain parties "who, under the constitution of Oregon, as governor, secretary of state, and treasurer of that State, comprised the board of land commissioners of that State, to restrain and enjoin them from selling and conveying a large amount of land in that State, to which the plaintiff asserted title." That suit, in view of the nature of the relief asked, and of the relations of the defendants to the matters involved, was held not to be one against the State within the meaning of the eleventh amendment. But after a review of the facts the court, as explanatory of the conclusion reached by it, took especial care to observe: "In this connection it must be borne in mind that this suit is not nominally against the governor, secretary of state, and treasurer, as such officers, but against them collectively, as the board of land commissioners." The present suit is, in terms, against Young "as attorney-general of Minnesota," and the decree was sought against him, as such officer, not against him individually, or as a mere administrative officer charged with certain duties.

One of the cases cited in support of the decision now rendered is Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company v. Missouri Railroad and Warehouse Commissioners (183 U. S., 53, 58, 59). But although that particular suit was held not to be one against the State, the case, in respect of the principles announced by the court, is in harmony with the views I have expressed. For the court there says: "Was the State the real party plaintiff? It was an early day held by this court, construing the eleventh amendment, that in all cases where jurisdiction depends on the party, it is the party named in the record. (Osborne v. United States Bank, 9 Wheat., 738.) But that technical construction has yielded to one more in consonance with the spirit of the amendment, and in In re Ayres (123 U. S., 443) it was ruled upon full consideration that the amendment covers not only suits against a State by name but those also against its officers, agents, and representatives where the State, though not named as such, is nevertheless the only real party against which in fact the relief is asked, and against which the judgment or decree effectively operates. And that construction of the amendment has since been followed." In the present case the State, although not named on the record as a party, is the real party whose action it is sought to control.

There are other cases in this court in which the scope and meaning of the eleventh amendment were under consideration, but they need not be cited, for they are well known. They are all cited in In re Ayers (123 U. S., 443, 500). "The vital principle in all such cases," this court said in the Ayers case, "is that the defendants, though professing to act as officers of the State, are threatening a violation of the personal or property rights of the complainant, for which they are personally and individually liable," or cases in which the officer sued refused to perform a purely ministerial duty, about which he had no discretion and in the performance of which the plaintiff had a direct interest. The case before us is altogether different. The statutes in question did not impose upon the attorney-general of Minnesota any special duty to see to their enforcement. In bringing the mandamus suit he acted under the general authority inhering in him as the chief law officer of his State. He could not become personally liable to the railway company simply because of his bringing the mandamus suit. The attorney-general stated that all he did, or contemplated doing, was to bring the mandamus suit. The mere bringing of such a suit could not be alleged against him as an individual in violation of any legal right of the railway company or its shareholders. (In re Ayers, 123 U. S., 443, 496.) The plaintiffs recognized this fact and hence did not proceed in their suit upon the ground that the defendant was individually liable. They sued him only as attorney-general and sought a decree against him in his official capacity, not otherwise.

Some reference has been made to Ex parte Royall (117 U. S., 241) and other cases that affirm the authority of a Federal court, under existing statutes, to discharge upon habeas corpus from the custody of a State officer one who is held in violation of the Federal Constitution for an alleged crime against a State. Those cases are not at all in point in the present discussion. Such a habeas corpus proceeding is ex parte, having for its object only to inquire whether the applicant for the writ is illegally restrained of his liberty. If he is, then the State officer holding him in custody is a trespasser, and can not defend the wrong or tort committed by him by pleading his official character. The power in a Federal court to discharge a person from the custody of a trespasser may well exist, and yet the court have no power in a suit before it, by an order directed against the attorney-general of a State, as such, to prevent the State from being represented by that officer as a litigant in one of its own courts. The former cases, it may be argued, come within the decisions which hold that a suit which only seeks to prevent or restrain a trespass upon property or person by one who happens to be a State officer, but is proceeding in violation of the Constitution of the United States, is not a suit against a State within the meaning of the eleventh amendment, but a suit against the trespasser or wrongdoer. But the authority of the Federal court to protect one against a trespass committed or about to be committed by a State officer in violation of the Constitution of the United States is very different from the power now asserted, and recognized by this court as existing, to shut out a sovereign State from its own courts by the device of forbidding its attorney-general, under the penalty of fine and imprisonment, from appearing in such courts in its behalf. The mere bringing of a suit on behalf of a State by its attorney-general can not, this court has decided in the Ayers case, make that officer a trespasser and individually liable to the party sued. To enjoin him from representing the State in such suit is therefore, for every practical or legal purpose, to enjoin the State itself. This court in the Debs case (158 U. S., 564, 584) said: "Every government, entrusted by the very terms of its being with powers and duties to be exercised and discharged for the general welfare, has a right to apply to its own courts for any proper assistance in the exercise of the one and the discharge of the other, and it is no sufficient answer to its appeal to one of those courts that it has no pecuniary interest in the matter. The obligation which it is under to promote the interest of all and to prevent the wrongdoing of one resulting in injury to the general welfare is often of itself sufficient to give it a standing in court. This proposition in some of its relations has heretofore received the sanction of this court." If there be one power that a State possesses which ought to be deemed beyond the control, in any mode, of the National Government or of any of its courts, it is the power by judicial proceedings to appear in its own courts, by its law officer or by attorneys, and seek the guidance of those courts in respect of matters of a justiciable nature. If the State court, by its judgment in such a suit, should disregard the injunctions of the Federal Constitution that judgment would be subject to review by this court upon writ of error or appeal.

It will be well now to look at the course of decisions in other Federal courts.

Attention is first directed to Arbuckle v. Blackburn (113 Fed. Rep., 616, 622), which was a suit in equity, one of the principal objects of which was to restrain the enforcement of an act of the Ohio legislature relating to food products, particularly of a named coffee in which the plaintiffs were interested. The circuit court of appeals held that the bill was properly dismissed, saying, among other things: "What, then, is the object of the injunction sought in this case? It is no more or less than to restrain the officer of the State from bringing prosecutions for violations of an act which said officer is expressly charged to enforce in the only way he is authorized to proceed—by bringing criminal prosecutions in the name of the State. This is virtually to enjoin the State from proceeding through its duly qualified and acting officers. If the food commissioner may be enjoined from instituting such prosecutions, why may not the prosecuting attorney, or any officer of the State charged with the execution of the criminal laws of the State? While the State may not be sued, if the bill can be sustained against its officers, it is as effectually prevented from proceeding to enforce its laws as it would be by an action directly against the State. This view of the case, in our judgment, is amply sustained by the cases above cited, and by the latter case of Fitts v. McGhee (172 U. S., 516). In so far as this action seeks an injunction against the respondent from proceeding to enforce by prosecution the provisions of the statutes of Ohio above cited, the courts of the United States are deprived of jurisdiction by the eleventh amendment to the Constitution."

In Union Trust Company v. Stearns (119 Fed. Rep., 790, 791, 792, 795) the circuit court of the United States for the district of Rhode Island had occasion to consider the scope of the eleventh amendment. The case related to a statute regulating the hours of labor of certain employees of street railways and imposing a fine for a violation of its provisions. The court upon an elaborate review of all the cases in this court dismissed the action. The defendants Stearns and Greenough were, respectively, the attorney-general and assistant attorney-general of the State. They were not named in the act nor charged with any special duty in connection therewith. The court said: "The purpose of the present bill, in substance and effect, is to enjoin the State of Rhode Island from the enforcement of a penal statute. Indictments under the act are brought in the name and on behalf of the State for the protection of the State. These defendants, the attorney-general and his assistant, merely represent the State in such proceedings. They are simply the officers and agents of the State. It is not as individuals, but solely by virtue of their holding such offices, that they prefer and prosecute indictments in the name of the State. A State can only act or be proceeded against through its officers. If a decree could be entered against the State of Rhode Island enjoining prosecutions under this act, it could only operate against the State through enjoining these defendants. An order restraining the attorney-general and his assistant from the enforcement of this statute is an order restraining the State itself. The present suit, therefore, is as much against the State of Rhode Island as if the State itself were named a party defendant." After referring to In re Ayers and Fitts v. McGhee, and upon a review of the cases, the court proceeded: "The defendants Stearns and Greenough hold no special relation to the act of June 1, 1902. They are not specially charged with its execution. They are not thereby constituted a board or commission with administrative powers, nor are they as individuals, and apart from the official authority under which they act, threatening to seize the property of the complainant or to commit any wrong or trespass against its personal or property rights. They have no other connection with this statute than the institution of formal judicial proceedings for its enforcements in the courts of the State in the name and behalf of the State. Upon reason and authority the present bill is a suit against the State of Rhode Island, within the meaning of the eleventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

In Morenci Copper Company v. Freer (127 Fed. Rep., 199, 205), which was an action in equity to restrain and inhibit the defendant, in his official capacity as attorney-general of West Virginia, from proceeding to institute an action in the State court for forfeiture of the charter of the plaintiff corporation for a failure to pay a license tax imposed by a State statute, and which statute was alleged to be in violation of the Federal Constitution, the circuit court reviewed the decision of this court upon the question as to what and what were not suits against the State. The circuit court held that it had no jurisdiction of the case, saying: "But it may be said, if the court holds that no remedy of this sort will lie in the circuit court of the United States to prevent this breach of a contract by the State of West Virginia by means of the machinery of a law violative of the Constitution of the United States, how are the rights of corporations to be preserved? The answer is that such alleged unconstitutionality is matter of defense to any suit brought for the forfeiture of complainant's charter, and could be set up as an answer and defense to any bill brought for that purpose, and, if the highest court of the State ruled adversely to that contention, appeal would lie to the Supreme Court of the United States. Or the case can be removed to the circuit court of the United States if it presents a case arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States."

A well-considered case is that of Western Union Telegraph Company v. Andrews (154 Fed. Rep., 95, 107). In that case the telegraph company sought by bill to enjoin the prosecuting attorneys of the various judicial circuits of Arkansas from instituting any proceeding for penalties for its failure or refusal to comply with the provisions of an act of the legislature of Arkansas relating to foreign corporations doing business in that State and fixing fees, etc. The bill charged that the various prosecuting attorneys would, unless restrained, institute numerous actions for the recovery of the penalities prescribed by the act, which was no less than $1,000 for each alleged violation. The defense was, among other things, that the action was one against the State, and therefore prohibited by the Constitution. After a careful review of the adjudged cases in this court and in the subordinate Federal courts the circuit court held the action to be one against the State, forbidden by the eleventh amendment, saying, among other things: "The allegations in the bill show that this is an attempt to prevent the State of Arkansas, through its officers, who by its laws are merely its attorneys, to represent it in all legal actions in its favor or in which it is interested, from instituting and prosecuting suits for the recovery of penalties incurred for alleged violation of its laws, actions which can only be instituted in the name of the State and for its use and benefit."

Upon the fullest consideration and after a careful examination of the authorities, my mind has been brought to the conclusion that no case heretofore determined by this court requires us to hold that the Federal circuit court had authority to forbid the attorney-general of Minnesota from representing the State in the mandamus suit in the State court or to adjudge that he was in contempt and liable to be fined and imprisoned simply because of his having, as attorney-general, brought that suit for the State in one of its courts. On the contrary, my conviction is very strong that, if regard be had to former utterances of this court, the suit of Perkins and Shepard in the Federal court, in respect of the relief sought therein against Young, in his official capacity as attorney-general of Minnesota, is to be deemed—under the Ayers and Fitts cases particularly—a suit against the State of which the circuit court of the United States could not take cognizance without violating the eleventh amendment of the Constitution. Even if it were held that suits to restrain the instituting of actions directly to recover the prescribed penalties would not be suits against the State, it would not follow that we should go further and hold that a proceeding under which the State was, in effect, denied access, by its attorney-general, to its own courts, would be consistent with the eleventh amendment. A different view means, as I think, that although the judicial power of the United States does not extend to any suit expressly brought against a State by a citizen of another State without its consent or to any suit the legal effect of which is to tie the hands of the State, although not formally named as a party, yet a circuit court of the United States, in a suit brought against the attorney-general of a State, may, by orders directed specifically against that officer, control, entirely control, by indirection, the action of the State itself in judicial proceedings in its own courts involving the constitutional validity of its statutes. This court has heretofore held that that could not be done and that such a result would, for most purposes, practically obliterate the eleventh amendment and place the States, in vital particulars, as absolutely under the control of the subordinate Federal courts as if they were capable of being directly sued. I put the matter in this way, because to forbid the attorney-general of a State (under the penalty of being punished as for contempt) from representing his State in suits of a particular kind, in its own courts, is to forbid the State itself from appearing and being heard in such suits. Neither the words nor the policy of the eleventh amendment will, under our former decisions, justify any order of a Federal court the necessary effect of which will be to exclude a State from its own courts. Such an order attended by such results can not, I submit, be sustained consistently with the powers which the States, according to the uniform declarations of this court, possess under the Constitution. I am justified, by what this court has heretofore declared, in now saying that the men who framed the Constitution and who caused the adoption of the eleventh amendment would have been amazed by the suggestion that a State of the Union can be prevented by an order of a subordinate Federal court from being represented by its attorney-general in a suit brought by it in one of its own courts; and that such an order would be inconsistent with the dignity of the States as involved in their constitutional immunity from the judicial process of the Federal courts (except in the limited cases in which they may constitutionally be made parties in this court), and would be attended by most pernicious results.

I dissent from the opinion and judgment.

Mr. NELSON. I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves to lay the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill. On page 2, line 18, after the word "thereof," I move to strike out all the remainder of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma is not in order. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, agreed to the amendment; but, without objection, the Chair will regard the bill as being still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 18, after the word "thereof," strike out the remainder of the substitute bill, in the following words:

Upon the ground of unconstitutionality of the statute, unless the application for the same shall be presented to a circuit judge and shall be heard and determined, upon issue made and proof taken by affidavit or otherwise, by three judges, of whom two shall be circuit judges, and the third may be either a circuit or a district judge, and unless a majority of said three judges shall concur in granting such application. Whenever such application, as aforesaid, is presented to a circuit judge he shall immediately call to his assistance, to hear and determine the application, one circuit judge and one district judge or another circuit judge. Said application shall not be heard and determined until five days' notice of the hearing has been given to the governor and attorney-general of the State and such other persons as may be defendants in the suit: Provided, That if a majority of said judges are of the opinion, at the time notice of said hearing is given as aforesaid, that irreparable loss and damage would result to the applicant unless a temporary restraining order, pending the period of the required notice, is granted, a majority of said judges may grant such order, but the same shall only remain in force until the hearing and determination of the application, upon due notice as aforesaid, has taken place. That an appeal may be taken directly to the Supreme Court of the United States from any order or decree granting or denying, after notice and hearing, a temporary or interlocutory injunction or restraining order in such case; and the hearing of such appeal shall take precedence over all other cases except those of a similar character and criminal cases.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURKETT. May I ask what was done with the amendment that I offered?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment was laid upon the table on the motion of the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. BURKETT. I understand that it is too late to ask for a yea-and-nay vote on my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is too late.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILD LABOR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4812) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] is interested in the bill, and in his absence I will ask to have it passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice at the request of the Senator from Minnesota.

NATIONAL FORESTS.

The bill (S. 4825) for acquiring national forests in the Southern Appalachian Mountains and White Mountains was announced as the next in order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] desires to speak upon the bill. He informed me that he is indisposed, and he asked me to let the bill go over to some other day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be passed over without prejudice at the request of the Senator from Connecticut.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. McCREARY I desire to ask what was done with House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill?" It was reported more than a month ago, and it is a very important bill. It contains many items that persons in various States are interested in; a number of them are items my constituents are interested in. I desire to know why it is that we propose to pass over that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be announced by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15372) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and Tucker acts.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky that the reason why the bill has not been taken up for consideration is that the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] is absent from the city, and before leaving he requested that the bill be not taken up for consideration until his return. I understand that the chairman will be here about the 21st or the 22d of this month.

I wish also to say that I do not think it would hasten the passage of the bill in any way by pressing it at this time. I therefore ask that the bill may go over without prejudice.

Mr. McCREARY. I have no desire whatever to press the consideration of the bill, but as it was reported by the Committee on Claims more than a month ago, I desired to know why it was not acted upon when it was reached. The explanation of the Senator from Utah that the chairman of the committee [Mr. FULTON] will be here in a few days is entirely satisfactory to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will go over without prejudice at the request of the Senator from Utah.

SUSPENSION OF COMMODITY CLAUSE.

The joint resolution (S. R. 74) suspending the commodity clause of the present interstate-commerce law was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. NELSON. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce [Mr. ELKINS], who reported the bill, I ask that it be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

RECLAMATION OF SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 4855.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4855) appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States to the construction of works for the drainage or reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands belonging to the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. BACON. I move to strike out the fifth and sixth sections of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia proposes an amendment, which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of sections 5 and 6.

Mr. FLINT. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. BACON. I ask, before the motion is put, that the sections be read from the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the sections proposed to be stricken out.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 5. That where there are lands in any State not owned or held by the United States which are swamp or overflowed lands, and it shall be made to appear to the Secretary of the Interior that reclamation works by drainage can be advantageously constructed and maintained by local authority under the laws of such State, and that the drainage of such lands is feasible and conducive to public health and the general welfare, the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, is hereby authorized, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to loan out of the drainage fund to such State or to any municipality of such State, corporation, or drainage district authorized by the laws thereof to construct and maintain such improvements the funds necessary to construct the same, in order that such lands may be drained and reclaimed. Such loan shall be upon the bonds of such State or a municipality, corporation, or drainage district thereof issued under the laws of such State, secured by a first and paramount lien upon the land benefited by the improvement, shall run not exceeding ten years, the same to be due in installments to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior. Before granting such a loan the Secretary of the Interior shall require that the land proposed to be reclaimed shall be subdivided into lots of an area satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior not to exceed a quarter section and held for sale for a prescribed period to actual settlers, at a price to be fixed by him and upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, to the end that such reclaimed land may eventually be occupied by actual settlers and home builders. When any loan under this act is repaid the amount shall be put into the drainage fund and may be again loaned the same as the original sum: Provided, That any drainage project covered by said bonds shall be constructed, operated, and paid for under the same conditions and regulations, so far as applicable, as are required and imposed upon drainage projects constructed and operated by the Secretary of the Interior under sections 2, 3, and 4 hereof. Any private corporation seeking to obtain the benefits of this section must first show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that such corporation is empowered to act under this section.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to enter into such contracts as he may deem advisable with any persons or private or public corporations or States for carrying into effect the provisions of this act or to assist or cooperate in the drainage of lands, and may acquire by gift or grant land or other property or rights or securities, and shall be authorized to sell, lease, or dispose of lands acquired or reserved under the provisions of this act or of any rights, property, or securities so received.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator in charge of the bill, before he insists on his motion to table the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, to reflect that there has been no opportunity to debate these sections. They are very remarkable sections. They propose to extend the power of the Government into a domain which it has never yet invaded. They excite not only attention, but opposition, and it has been the practice, almost a rule, of the Senate that opportunity shall be given for legitimate debate upon any subject-matter.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. I have no desire to stop debate upon the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. No one here seemed to desire to discuss the amendment. I asked the Senator from Georgia this morning if he desired to further discuss the bill and I understood him to say that he did not. I put it in the form of a motion to lay the amendment on the table, so as to dispose of the matter. If anyone desires to debate the bill, either these sections or any other section, I do not care to shut him off, and I will be very glad to withdraw the motion.

Mr. HALE. That is entirely in conformity to what has been the usage, and the good usage, of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California withdraws his motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HALE. The rule of the Senate and the practice of the Senate require the disposition of a matter after it has been debated, and that has been the defense of the Senate against the attempt at different times to incorporate into our rules such proceedings as characterize other bodies. The previous question—what they call in England the cloture—we have always resisted, upon the theory that after due debate upon any question if the Senate desires to pass any measure it always passes it.

We had a marked instance last week on the employers' liability bill. Without any previous question, without any rule that prohibits debate after an entire day spent in its consideration, with debate pro and con upon different amendments, it became apparent that the Senate desired to pass the bill unamended, and at 6 o'clock all opposition closed—not in the minds of members, for it was not a perfect bill. It was very far from a perfect bill, but it had become established in the minds of the Senate by the debate which had taken place that the Senate desired to pass the bill unamended, and it passed without even a division or a vote by yeas and nays.

I felt myself at the time that that was a remarkable tribute to the safety and the wisdom of our rules and our practice. It showed that we do not need arbitrary methods for the purpose of enforcing votes upon measures, but that the good sense of the Senate will always prevail. That is why I appealed to the Senator, who is always responsive to a reasonable appeal, that upon this matter, where Senators are divided, until fair debate is had upon the propositions involved in these two sections the Senator should not seek to foreclose consideration by moving to lay the amendment upon the table, and the Senator very readily acceded to that.

There are provisions in the bill that I look upon as being great departures in legislation, to which I can not, for one, agree; but if the Senate, after reasonable debate, wants the bill passed, the Senator from California will get the bill passed. There is a sense of fairness in the minds of Senators that will prevail, as it always has prevailed. I am very glad that the Senator has withdrawn for the present his motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Georgia moved to strike out the two sections. I can see some reason myself for striking out section 6, but I should like to have the Senator from Georgia explain his reasons for eliminating section 5.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before replying directly to the inquiry of the Senator from North Dakota, I wish to say, in response to the statement made by the Senator from California that he had approached me to know whether I desired to discuss the bill, that that would rather imply that I stood as the special opponent of the bill or that I was charged with the special opposition to it. I am opposed to it, but I never heard of the bill until it was read here the other day. So I am not in a position of leading any organized, concerted opposition to it in any way. I am speaking solely for myself. The fact that I did not propose to speak on it did not indicate what anyone else might wish to do.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FLINT. I did not intend to convey the idea that I thought the Senator from Georgia was making any special point against the bill or leading any opposition. The motion having been made by him to strike out sections 5 and 6 and having discussed the bill day before yesterday, I happened to have some conversation with him, and I asked him if he desired to debate the bill further. He told me that he did not, and I simply made that statement to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I wish simply to relieve myself from what might have been concluded by others by the Senator making the statement that I was specially charged, or that I was representing anybody else, in the matter of my opposition to this bill.

Mr. President, I think that the reasons for the opposition to section 5, of which the Senator from North Dakota makes inquiry, are best explained by reading the section. It seems to me the mere reading of it shows the objectionable features and that those objectionable features would naturally suggest themselves to anyone upon the reading. As I said a moment ago, I knew there was some such bill pending, but I never saw it and never heard its provisions until the bill was read here on Wednesday.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BACON. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. I am somewhat surprised to hear the statement of the Senator from Georgia that he never heard of this bill before.

Mr. BACON. I corrected that; I modified it.

Mr. FLINT. I mean until within a few days.

Mr. BACON. No; I modified that. I said I knew there was some such bill, but that I had never heard its specific provisions and never had seen the bill until Wednesday. I did know that the late Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Latimer, was advocating a bill of this kind and that there was a bill upon the general subject of the reclamation of overflowed land, but what its provisions were I did not know; I had never sought to be informed.

Mr. FLINT. What I referred to was a letter from the Senator to the governor of Georgia in receiving a report from the representative of the State of Georgia appointed by the governor of that State to the drainage congress in Baltimore, in which I understood the Senator from Georgia had said he had read that report and it was a matter which had his careful consideration.

Mr. BACON. A letter from me?

Mr. FLINT. This very bill or a like bill was one of the things discussed in that report.

Mr. BACON. A letter from me?

Mr. FLINT. It was so reported in a Georgia paper that was sent to me some months ago.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, that may be so. If it is so, I can only account for it in this way, that I, as all other Senators, frequently have inquiries about pending legislation; and I simply write back, stating that I will give it proper consideration when it comes up. It may be that there was a letter prepared which I signed which committed me to the fact of knowledge of the bill, which is not the fact. We all know how letters are prepared by our clerical force on routine matters, and however inadvertently I may have signed such a letter—I do not dispute that—I have no recollection of it whatever. But if I did sign it, it was just in some such way as I have indicated. I certainly have had no familiarity with the measures which were proposed to be incorporated in the bill. I did know the fact in a general way that there was a proposition for some legislation looking to the reclamation of overflowed lands.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. The reason I mentioned that fact was that when this bill was prepared and drafted, it was after a consultation, as I understand, with Members from all the States in which there were swamp and overflowed lands, after there had been two congresses held, known as "drainage congresses," where this subject was under discussion. The bill that was drafted and introduced by me, and other bills which were introduced by other Senators last session, were there given consideration. I reached the conclusion that there was some doubt as to the constitutionality of the bill. We then had a conference in the office of the Secretary of the Interior. It is my understanding that all the Southern States which had swamp and overflowed lands were represented at that conference, and that invitations had been sent to the Senators and Members of the House from those States, and that this bill was the result of that conference. As I understood from the communications I had received, this bill met with the approval of practically all the Senators on that side of the Chamber; and I am somewhat surprised now to find a strong opposition to sections 5 and 6 in this bill, which were inserted after the conference to which I have referred and at the request of representatives from that side of the Chamber.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have no doubt all that the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT] says is true. I simply qualify it to the extent that I myself never participated in such a conference, and I myself have never given, knowingly at least, my consent to the provisions of this bill. I repeat that, so far as the detailed provisions of it are concerned, I never heard of them and never knew of them until the bill was read here two days ago.

Now, Mr. President, replying to the question of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], I will read section 5, and I trust Senators will listen to it in order that they may appreciate the magnitude of the proposition and may also appreciate the reasons why some of us are not prepared to put the burden upon the Government to undertake the risk which this section necessarily will put upon and entail upon the Government if the bill becomes a law. Section 5 is in these words:

SEC. 5. That where there are lands in any State not owned or held by the United States which are swamp or overflowed lands, and it shall be made to appear to the Secretary of the Interior that reclamation works by drainage can be advantageously constructed and maintained by local authority under the laws of such State, and that the drainage of such lands is feasible and conducive to public health and the general welfare, the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, is hereby authorized, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to loan out of the drainage fund to such State or to any municipality of such State, corporation, or drainage district—

"Corporation"—private corporation. Those are the words.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FLINT. The Senator from Georgia dwells on and reads with emphasis the word "corporation." I want to state to him that the word "corporation" was added to the bill. I myself thought it was questionable whether the word "corporation" should be used or permitted. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], who was present at that conference, requested that that word should be put into the bill for the reason that, under the constitution of his State, they can not form drainage districts, and they would have to have in the bill the word "corporation" or amend the State constitution, which they did not want to do.

Mr. BACON. That may be a good reason for it, but while that might be a good reason, it is the use of a word which would not be limited in its practical operation to the particular conditions in Alabama, but would include every corporation in the United States which might have an interest in overflowed lands anywhere in the United States—any corporation of any kind, large or small. If that does not open the door wide enough to haul all the money out of the Treasury in a six-horse wagon, I do not know how you could find language that would be better adapted to the purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I call the Senator's attention——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BACON. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will read along further he will see that the security——

Mr. BACON. Yes; I am coming to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Which the Government has may be nothing more than the bond of the corporation, whatever that may be.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can see the reason in section 6, because in that section you not only make the contracts with private corporations, but with individuals—with one or more persons. I could see the objection, but my attention had not been called specifically to the word "corporation" in the previous section.

Mr. BACON. Yes. Well, Mr. President, it seems to me that we do not even have to rest our objection on the simple matter of the use of the word "corporation." "Municipality" is a pretty wide word, and means every sort of municipal corporation, of which there are a good many hundred thousand, I suppose, in the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to understand, if the Senator will yield to me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BACON. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to understand the reason given by the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT] for the use of this word "corporation." Do I understand that there is no municipal corporation in the State of Alabama that could provide for this drainage—either the State itself or some municipal corporation under the State?

Mr. FLINT. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] is now in the Chamber and can answer that for himself.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not imagine a condition in which the State of Alabama itself could not enter into the arrangement for a loan of funds the same as any other State.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I want to say that the conditions in Alabama which required that provision are these: In the lower part of the State is a large quantity of swamp and overflowed lands not owned by the State originally, but ceded to the State by the Government. The purpose is to enable the owners of those lands to form a corporation and come in under the provisions of this bill. I repeat, these are not lands owned by the State or by any municipality, but the purpose is to enable their owners to organize a corporation and bring them in and have this development made, subjecting them to entry as are other lands.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I will continue to read, in response to the question propounded to me by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]—

Under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe—

That is, the Secretary of the Interior—

to loan out of the drainage fund—

It is true it is limited to the money which comes in from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands referred to—to such State or to any municipality of such State, corporation, or drainage district authorized by the laws thereof to construct and maintain such improvements the funds necessary to construct the same, in order that such lands may be drained and reclaimed.

Mr. President, the provision is absolutely without limitation as to what shall be the character of the work; what its cost shall be, and as to who shall be the judge of it. It is true the rules and regulations are to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, but I do not believe in giving to any man, whether he be an official or a private citizen, these wide privileges which relate to the expenditure of the public money.

Talk about extravagance! Mr. President, there is not any possible specific appropriation which can be suggested, or which has been suggested, which begins to reach out as this does in its absolutely limitless proportions for the expenditure of public money.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I think the authority will necessarily be limited to the fund, which is limited to a certain amount——

Mr. BACON. The drainage fund?

Mr. CLAPP. To money derived from a certain source; so that, while there is some latitude as to where the Secretary of the Interior could put the money, there is a limit to the amount which could be used under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I regard the scheme as one wild in the extreme—I think those words are not extravagant—a scheme wild in the extreme. I am simply stating this in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from North Dakota, because I had occupied so much of the time on Wednesday that I did not intend to occupy any further time, but I am responding to the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him long enough to follow out the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]? He is, as we know, a conservative Senator, a lawyer, who believes in the line of division between the States and the nation. I wish he would tell the Senate, following out his suggestion—and it was a pertinent suggestion—that, however bad the operation of this bill might be, it would be limited by the extent of the fund which could be used in ways to which the Senator from Georgia and others of us are opposed. But in the construction of this bill, in the consultation and consideration of the entire scope and effect of the bill, can the Senator from Minnesota tell us what it was believed would be the extent of the fund which can be used under the provisions of sections 5 and 6? I am asking the question in good faith, because I do not know in the least how much has been left by otherwise profound schemes and plans that have been incorporated into law for the absorption of the proceeds of the sale of public lands. How much do the friends of this scheme believe will be the amount of the fund that could be used in carrying out the provisions of this bill? What was the contemplation of the originators of the plan?

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Georgia pardon me, as the question of the Senator from Maine calls for a slightly extended interruption?

Mr. BACON. I shall be more than happy if the Senator will proceed. I am on the floor simply in response to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. HALE. I think we are all trying to get light on this matter.

Mr. BACON. Yes; and I shall be delighted to have some information along that line.

Mr. CLAPP. On the primary question of the Government taking hold as an instrumentality in the development of this country, of course I would not at this time enter upon a discussion. Some time ago, as Senators will all remember, a proportion of the proceeds from the sale of the public lands was dedicated to the reclamation of arid lands, briefly stated, constituting something in the nature of a revolving fund. The bill provides that the money received from the sale and disposal of the public lands in the States that are mentioned in the first section since the year 1901—the time at which we began to take the money for the reclamation of arid lands—shall be set aside as a drainage fund. As near as we can ascertain, that sum amounts now to about $5,000,000.

There were three conditions that were to be met. First, where the Government had public land or where the Government was acting as the trustee for ceded Indian reservations. That far the question would be free from very much complication. Under the drainage law the area that can be taken into a drainage district is limited and easily defined, and provision can be made for placing it subordinate to the action of the Federal Government in the administration of the drainage scheme. It would be somewhat difficult for the Federal Government to approach the drainage of lands not owned by the Government in that way.

Many of the States already have laws whereby drainage districts can be created under the State law, the right of eminent domain being exercised, and, under the State law, bonds issued and made a first lien upon all the land embraced in the drainage district.

I may as well say right here that so far as I am personally concerned, looking at this purely from a selfish standpoint, I would have no objection whatever to letting sections 5 and 6 go out of this bill.

Mr. CLAY. Right there, with the Senator's permission, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DILLINGHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. As I understand, there are two schemes in this bill——

Mr. CLAPP. Three.

Mr. CLAY. Yes, three. One is to take the proceeds of the public lands that have been collected since 1901 and convert those proceeds into a drainage fund amounting to $5,800,000.

Mr. CLAPP. Approximately.

Mr. CLAY. Yes; I have the figures; and for that fund to be used in draining swamp lands owned by the Government of the United States, and then to be loaned out to private individuals or corporations in States wishing to drain private lands, not lands belonging to the State or to the Government. In other words, as I understand, the provisions in sections 5 and 6 contemplate that if corporations or drainage companies own swamp lands in the States and the Secretary of the Interior thinks it proper to let those persons or corporations have public funds for the purpose of draining their lands, then the Secretary of the Interior can grant that privilege and take a lien upon the land in the shape of the bonds of the private companies for the purpose of securing the Government. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. CLAPP. I was trying to explain that.

Mr. CLAY. Just a word right there, with the Senator's permission. When we undertake by taxation to collect money from the entire American people and loan it to private individuals to develop their private enterprises, is it not a very dangerous step?

Is it not true, I will ask, with the Senator's permission, that if you let the drainage companies have public funds to develop their private enterprises, men who may want to develop railroads or factories or any other geat enterprises may say. "Follow the same line, collect money, and loan it to us to develop our enterprises?" Is not it a very dangerous precedent when we undertake to collect funds for any other purpose except to pay the expenses of the Government?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I share with the Senator in charge of this bill surprise at the attitude of some Senators in regard to this particular section 5. We had a conference, at which several Southern Senators and several Southern Representatives in Congress were present, and we were advised by them that in some of their States neither the State nor the counties could issue bonds. I think the State of Arkansas was mentioned as one of them, although we afterwards learned that drainage districts in that State could issue bonds in order that this money might be used. In those States where, under their constitutions, neither the counties nor the State could issue bonds which the Secretary of the Interior could purchase to aid them by taking their bonds, at the suggestion of some of these gentlemen from States thus situated with reference to their constitutions, those who worked on this measure, after two or three conferences, inserted the word "corporation." As I said before, so far as my State is concerned and so far as I am personally concerned, I have no objections whatever to sections 5 and 6 going out of this bill. They were inserted in order that this money might not be limited in its use to the States in which the money was collected, but that those States which had no public lands, if they could not reach out either as States or by the action of their counties and participate in the benefits of this fund, could, under their statutes, authorize the creation of drainage districts, which had to be called "corporations," and thus obtain their share of the benefits of this bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. CLAPP. In just one moment. I should like to complete this sentence. I can see no great difference in principle between the United States Government depositing money in the banks or using its money to carry on reclamation projects in the form of a revolving fund and the use of this money for this particular purpose. The principle is already established. Now I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. FOSTER. Just for information, Mr. President, I should like to ask upon what basis this fund is to be distributed among the different States?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, there could be fixed no definite basis. If there could have been, it would have been to the disadvantage of the States represented by some of the Senators who seem to be in opposition to this bill. For one, representing a State that has contributed a large amount to this Government fund, I should be perfectly satisfied, looking at it purely from a selfish standpoint, to limit this to the States in proportion as it came from the States, but in a spirit of fairness and recognizing the condition——

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator can not think that it would be just and equitable to take the public lands belonging to the Government of the United States located in certain States and sell those lands, take the proceeds, and utilize them for the benefit of the States in which the land is located? The public lands of the United States belong to the American people.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not say that would be fair.

Mr. CLAY. Well, I understood the Senator to say that he would be perfectly willing——

Mr. CLAPP. I said "looking at it from a purely selfish standpoint."

Mr. CLAY. I understand the Senator now. Certainly, that would not be equitable.

Mr. CLAPP. But taking a fair view and a broad view, this fund would be distributed.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to ask another question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield further to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. What limitation or restriction is placed upon the Secretary of the Interior in the matter of loans to private corporations and individuals?

Mr. CLAPP. There is no limitation, except that the State seeking the benefit of this bill must pass the necessary laws authorizing action to be taken by the State itself if, under its constitution, it can borrow the money, or by the counties, or, if neither the counties nor the State, under the State constitution, can borrow it, then to authorize the creation of corporations for that purpose. If the Secretary of the Interior is satisfied of the legality of those proceedings and the security that is provided for the bond issue, he may use the money for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. HALE. I am in search of information, and I have not the familiarity with the operation of the land laws, for instance, that Western Senators have. I am going to make an inquiry which may only demonstrate my lack of information on this subject. The Senator refers to the use of this fund as though it were a special and existing fund by itself. It is made up of the proceeds from the sale of public lands that have come into the Treasury since the year 1901. Am I correct in that?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Now, as I have said, it may disclose my entire lack of information, but what has become of the funds that have been realized from the sale of public lands since 1901, unless they have gone into the Treasury? And if those funds have gone into the Treasury like any other funds received by the Government, wherein does this bill differ from in terms appropriating so much money out of the Treasury in order to create this reserve from which these appropriations and expenditures shall be made?

As I say, I am not familiar enough to know. When the Government collects duties they go into the Treasury. The money comes from a specific source. But it is a part of the revenue and becomes a part of the Treasury fund. Is there any law by which funds derivable by the Government from the sales of public lands differ from any other assets of the Treasury? And if not, why refer to this as a special fund which has been received by the Government since 1901? Why not make an outright appropriation? I wish the Senator would tell the Senate. It may be that everybody else knows why this is so. I do not.

Mr. CLAPP. I will say to the Senator from Maine——

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator from Maine——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator from Maine will read the first section of the bill, I think he will find that this is an appropriation equal to the amount of the money received from the sales of public lands since 1901.

Mr. HALE. I had so supposed.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Why not put it in terms as an appropriation?

Mr. CLAPP. I will explain why. Of course in effect it is an appropriation of this money, and there is no disguising of that fact in the bill. But when we started the Reclamation Service there was possibly some sort of sentiment that while this money was in the Treasury of the United States, yet, having come from some particular source, it was proper to use it for the purpose of reclaiming the arid lands; and it was simply to put it on all fours with that, to give it the same claim to the consideration of the Senate, to place it upon a parallel with the general scheme of the reclamation of arid lands, that it was limited to a sum equal to the money received from the sale of public lands in the States named.

Mr. HALE. Then the Senator recognizes the fact that it is an appropriation from the Treasury, only limited in amount by what the avails of this fund have been for the last seven years?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. It is an outright appropriation from the Treasury.

Mr. CLAPP. That is the reason why these States were referred to. We felt, as I have already said, that it would place this plan on all fours with the plan to appropriate this sum in that way. I think that is all I care to say, unless some other Senator cares to ask questions.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, some years ago the Government entered upon this great step of making homes for the American people. It started out with the arid lands of the West. The same economic spirit which actuated the Senate in voting for the reclamation of arid lands logically would lead the Senate to vote for the reclamation of swamp lands. The reasons are the same, and the conditions are practically the same. So I find myself heartily in favor of the Government assisting in that great project, which may be said to be too great for the States to handle alone. It is proper to drain these swamp lands where we can do so.

But I can not say that I am in exact harmony with the provisions of this bill and the methods by which it seeks to accomplish that particular purpose. The public lands in any State are to a certain extent assets of that State. They belong to the State. They become part of the property of the State. As the lands in one portion of a State, being very rich, might be taxed in order to open up and develop other lands that were less valuable, so it might be proper that the proceeds of the sale of lands in some portions of the United States might well be utilized in the development of other sections of the country. So we have made no objection to that proposition.

We will suppose now that there are in Florida a few hundred thousand acres of swamp lands, or there may be a million acres of swamp lands, that can properly be drained. The State does not want to take hold of the proposition. The Government itself is able to take hold of it. But I can not imagine why we can not reach this by a simple proposition and by a contract with the State in every instance. There is not a State in the Union which, by reason of its sovereignty, can not make any provision it sees fit for the taxation of lands in any district or in any portion of the State for the purpose of its internal development; and if it can make such a law affecting the lands within the State, it can also pass a law which would be in harmony with the spirit of this bill for the utilization of a portion of the funds raised under it to be used in the State and to be secured in such way as the laws of the State may designate.

So there seems to me to be the first objection that can be logically made against this bill. It seeks to deal with the municipality. It seeks to deal separately with the county. It seeks to deal with the drainage district, and finally it goes further and deals with a corporation, and ends up by making a special contract with any individual who wishes to have his farm drained, and the nation itself is placed in a position where it must enter into a contract with that individual if he has 1 or 10,000 acres to be drained.

I do not believe that the Government itself, if it is going to enter on this project, should deal with anyone but the State, and Congress should pass a law framed in such a way that the State itself can take advantage of it and pass such laws as it sees fit in order to secure the repayment of the fund that may be provided for this purpose.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. The purpose of this bill is just as outlined in the statement of the Senator from North Dakota, and the language which he refers to, "individuals or corporations," was inserted to cover a certain condition that exists in certain States. In my opinion, those two words should be stricken from the bill, and it should be left so that the transaction would be entirely with the State or with a drainage district or a municipality.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would go further than that and eliminate the municipality and the drainage district, and let the State provide by its own laws what portion of the State it desires to have drained, and then make provision to act in harmony with the General Government in seeking to reclaim that particular district.

But here is another objection that I have outside of that, and that is to the use in one State of funds realized in another State. I can see how it would operate, more particularly in my own State. Out of the twenty-five or thirty million dollars that has been raised for the reclamation fund my own State has contributed eight or ten million dollars. Of the eight or ten million dollars already contributed there has been used within the State only about a half a million dollars. Most of it has gone to Colorado and Arizona, where it was thought they needed it in those great projects. We are not seriously objecting to the fact that they take the money received from the sales of land in our State to develop these other States, but along the eastern line of that State and the western line of the State of Minnesota there is a vast tract of country—the valley of the Red River of the North, about 40 miles at the south end, gradually growing wider, until it is nearly 600 or 800 miles wide at the north end of the valley. It is alluvial land. It is subject to overflow during many years by the rise of the Red River, and much damage has been done. On the west side to some extent, on the eastern side to a great extent, they have suffered by reason of the inability to drain the country.

A great system must be inaugurated, a system that will take in a section of country as large as several of the Eastern States. Now, that can only be dealt with by the Government itself. The State of Minnesota has appropriated millions of dollars for drainage on the eastern side, and yet they have only begun that great project. If we are to deal with the Government, we prefer that the money realized in our State, or at least a goodly portion of it, may be used for that purpose, and not go off wholly to another State. I wish to make the provisions of this bill so broad and so certain that if the two great States of Minnesota and North Dakota desire to enter into a contract whereby eight or ten million dollars from those States are to be used for this purpose they shall have the power to do so, and they shall have a preference right before the balance of the fund is taken to develop some other sections of the country.

Under the present condition the money will all, perhaps, be used in the development of the country in the southern section. But we can not have one law for one State and another law for another, and so I think we should modify this bill so that the contract shall be made at all times between the State and the General Government, and the contract shall be such as shall be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior, and as will insure the repayment of the sum loaned for that purpose.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator from North Dakota whether the land to which he refers has passed into private ownership or whether it belongs to the State under the act of 1850 granting to the States the swamp lands within their boundaries?

Mr. McCUMBER. Nearly all of the public land in that section of the country has been taken up. On the west side through our State there is, perhaps, not an acre that is not now in private ownership. But the Senator must remember that in this reclamation project we must take in private with public lands. The land for the most part has entered into private ownership, and it makes no difference to the Government whether the land is to-day in public ownership and to-morrow will go into private ownership or whether it is in private ownership to-day and will remain so to-morrow. The object is to make a certain portion of the country productive, so that it may support the vastly increasing population of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator is somewhat mistaken. I think the Reclamation Service deals only with public lands. I know it is said that the Government has been going beyond that, but I think the act itself did not contemplate anything but the management of public lands.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator is mistaken, because I think he will find provisions in the act as to land in private ownership. We have a project to-day in our own State, although it is only a small system of a few thousand acres, and yet, perhaps, three-fourths of that is in private ownership. So whatever our system may be in the future, we shall have to consider it as applying to private lands, and as it applies to lands in private ownership we will have to deal with the State, which has jurisdiction over the land, in order to get the proper authority for condemnation proceedings and otherwise.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he has given any attention to the decisions of the Supreme Court in two or three cases, where they have declared that the Reclamation Service could only be sustained on the theory that the Government was improving its own land? The court was very emphatic in the case of Kansas v. Colorado, which can be found in 206 United States——

Mr. CLAY. Page 80.

Mr. McCUMBER. I remember very well that case.

Mr. TELLER. The question came before the court——

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand the theory of the court.

Mr. TELLER. The question came before the court whether it could sustain the constitutionality of that act, and it put it, I understand, rather reluctantly and rather feebly, on the ground that it was Government land and the Government was improving its own land.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no doubt whatever of the constitutionality of a law which should declare that the proceeds of the sales of public lands in any given area may be used for the development of certain sections of the United States, with the consent of the State in which the land is situated and upon a law passed by that State.

This is all I desire to say in reference to the matter. It does seem to me that we ought to modify the bill so as to get rid of municipalities, private corporations, and individuals and deal only with the great States.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the bill contains a provision which is so manifestly unjust that it devolves upon those who have charge of the measure to explain, as I do not think they can justify on any principle of justice familiar to me. The fund is raised by the sale of land in thirteen enumerated States, and under section 5 the money may be loaned out to any drainage project in any of the forty-six States of the Union. The so-called "arid and semiarid States" have had all of the public lands within their borders donated to them for the purpose of reclaiming lands of that character by irrigation. Quite a considerable fund has been created from sales of these lands. The State of Texas reserved all of the public lands in that republic at the time it was made a part of the Union. Yet all these States have a right to participate in the distribution under this bill, notwithstanding the fact they have contributed nothing to the fund. The thirteen States, the sale of whose land has produced the fund, have absolutely no preference.

It is perfectly obvious that it is left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to select the particular drainage scheme to which he will devote the fund. It rests in his discretion absolutely, without control or supervision. It is a power solely vested in him. He may conclude that some New England enterprise first requires to be developed, rather than some one located in some one of the thirteen States, the proceeds of the sale of the land within whose borders constitute the fund. It widens that bureaucratic idea of discretion which ought not to be further enlarged. The determination of a matter of this magnitude should not, in justice to all sections and interests concerned, be submitted to the uncontrolled discretion of any one man, no matter how eminent he may be. So far as I am concerned, I am not willing to so submit it on behalf of the State of Arkansas.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has just said, with much force, that there is a certain relation between the public land in a State and the State itself; and the policy of the Government has been to regard the money derived from this source as a fund legitimately to be devoted to the development and improvement of the locality in which it is raised. That policy was adopted and carried out in the early history of the Government, when the swamp and overflowed lands act of September, 1850, was passed. It is further shown in the act providing for the reclamation system under which many irrigation projects are being carried forward. There is no reason why that traditional policy should be departed from now, unless the explanation is to be found in the fact that it has become necessary to get more Congressional votes in its support than could be marshaled if the bill were limited to a recognition of that first and salutary practice. It is recognized as among the permissible tactics of legislation that sometimes bills must contain provisions more comprehensive than their actual merit in order to enlist enough votes to make them laws. That seems to me to be the only excuse why it should in this instance be provided that a fund raised by the sale of public lands in thirteen particular States shall be available for distribution throughout the entire Union.

The New England States have no public lands, and never had any in the sense we now understand the term. The supposition is that these States have from time to time received an equivalent in the way of Government favors which will more than equalize in the general accounting the absence of a body of public lands.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not familiar with this subject, my attention not having been called to the bill until to-day. I wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas, who is familiar with it, whether if these public lands belonging to the Government were sold the money would not go into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Unquestionably.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the New England States would naturally derive some benefit from that fund.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. If these lands are to be disposed of as provided for in this bill, is there any injustice in providing that the States which do not have public lands within their borders shall derive some benefit from the measure itself? Is there any injustice in it?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I would hardly characterize it so strongly as "injustice," but I should say it was not consistent with the policy of the Government, which, from the beginning, has been to treat the proceeds arising from the sale of these lands, not as part of the revenue of the Government, but as a means of developing the vicinity in which the lands are situated. Under the settled policy of the Government these lands and the proceeds of the sale thereof are deemed parts of the public revenue in a limited and special way only. The whole course has been to devote them and their proceeds to the development of the locality in which they are situated. A primary dedication was laid upon them for that purpose. After sale for cash, and the proceeds have become in fact a part of the general revenues of the Government, the State's share therein has been fixed at 5 per cent. The States are allowed to appropriate, under existing law, to their own use 5 per cent of the proceeds of the sale of public lands within their borders. This is the State's entire interest after the public lands have become by cash sale a part of the public revenues.

Mr. President, the objection I have to the bill in its present form is fundamental. After the Government has pursued so long and so uniformly this policy of using the public lands in a locality for the improvement of that particular locality, it ought not to be departed from now. The proceeds of the sale of the lands in these thirteen States should be used to create a drainage fund, and there should be devised some fair and just system of distribution among the States whose lands contributed to the raising of the fund, and it should not be left entirely to the discretion of any officer, no matter if he is a member of the Cabinet, to say that a single drainage scheme in some State remote from those contributing to the fund shall absorb it all, to the exclusion of the contributors. Even if there should be a basis of distribution adopted that would distribute to the noncontributing States only part of the fund, still that would only qualify the injustice.

As the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has stated, his State contributed $10,000,000 to the irrigation fund, and although that Service has been in operation for some ten years less than half a million have been expended in his State. It may be that the area of the States with which North Dakota is grouped is so small and the fund is so large that ultimately they will get around to North Dakota in the distribution and do justice to that Commonwealth. But that never can happen in this case, for the reason that North Dakota and every other State in the Union, many of which have been liberally and amply provided for in other ways, will be entitled to participate in the benefits of the act to the same extent—possibly to the exclusion—as the thirteen States, the sale of whose lands has brought into existence the fund. I protest against it. I can see no reason founded in justice and a due recognition of the equities that have grown out of a fixed and generally observed policy why it should be so.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I can hardly agree with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] in his position. While it is true that the amount appropriated by this bill is based upon the amount that has been received in the past from the sale of public lands in the States named, and that there is also appropriated the money which is to be received from those States, still the fact remains that the money which is in the Treasury of the United States belongs to the people of the United States, and it should be placed where, all things considered, the demands of the situation and everything else, it ought to go. If there were some particular place that required relief to-day we would appropriate money for that purpose, even though that locality might not have contributed a dollar thereto.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Why, then, do you refer to the money derived from the sale of public lands since 1901? Why do you not say that "$5,000,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated?"

Mr. CLAPP. Because it would have taken more language and would have been no clearer.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is a question of language? I thought it was a question of money.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, there are two provisions of this appropriation. First, we appropriate an amount of money equal to that which they have paid and then we appropriate the money hereafter received from the sale of land in these States.

There is nothing obscure about it in that respect. No one who reads the bill can fail to see that in one instance it is in effect taking money which is to-day in the Treasury of the United States, and, while so far as some of our States are concerned it would be to their benefit, perhaps, to limit it as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, this is a measure that can only be justified upon the ground that it is for the general good of the people of the United States.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator a question, with his permission.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator might say that with reference to the reclamation of public lands, because when reclaimed they would be enhanced in value, and the benefit of that enhancement would enure to all. Could the Senator say that to lend money to corporations or municipalities or other owners of particular overflowed lands is a matter for the general good; something that will enure to the benefit of all people?

Mr. CLAPP. If it is not, it can not be justified.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator is right in that respect.

Mr. CLAPP. We will take a community in some frontier State of this Union. There is not a citizen of the United States who to some degree—it might be difficult to determine to what degree—is not interested in the prosperity, the welfare, and the happiness of that community. Upon what other theory can you take money which is paid into the Treasury of the United States and expend it to deepen a river in Oregon or in Louisiana? It is on the principle that it is for the benefit of the entire people of the United States.

Mr. BACON. The river is open to the commerce of the United States.

Mr. CLAPP. The land, perhaps, in Missouri that is reclaimed under this bill is open to the homeseeker from some great city of the East.

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking of public lands.

Mr. CLAPP. I am speaking of private lands—lands that to-day could not be made a home by the individual. A thousand people from New York City seeking homes would not have the means to take a tract of land and convert it into cultivable land so that they could make a living off of it.

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator this question: Would not the same reason justify the Government in lending a farmer money with which to buy fertilizer for his land on the ground that it would produce more crops and thus be a benefit to all the people of the United States?

Mr. CLAPP. No; because, as a rule, the farmer, no matter how small his farm, is able to cultivate his farm; but when you find a large area overflowed, the poor settler is not able to drain that land.

Mr. BACON. I do not wish by my inquiry to be possibly misunderstood by some unreasoning person as saying that I would favor loaning money to the farmer for that purpose. I simply endeavored to show the untenableness of the argument of the Senator from Minnesota by that illustration. I think that one would be equally as proper a subject of consideration by the Government as the other.

Mr. CLAPP. I think there is a vast difference between an individual who in some way can cultivate his little farm and people trying to recover swamp and overflowed land that can only be done either by a large amount of capital or by the combined credit which rests upon the value of the lands when they are reclaimed.

But, as I said before, that is a phase of the bill I do not care particularly for. It seemed to me when I drew the bill, and it seems to me to-day, that it is a very proper measure.

In regard to the relation of the State to the bill, this was done because those who drew the bill and worked the bill out were advised that certain States under their constitutions could not carry this work forward, and the only thing which they could do would be to pass a law, just as I understand was done in Arkansas, to authorize a drainage district to incur indebtedness and issue bonds.

So far as one interested in the bill, I am perfectly willing to concede the position of the Senator from North Dakota, if it is fair in view of the constitutional limitations which rest, I understand, upon some of the States. There was nothing secret about these conferences. We tried to get all who were interested in drainage from the North and the South and the West. The South was particularly interested, and it was represented at the conferences. We tried to draw a bill which would be fair to all those who might be interested in the outcome.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Does not the bill go very much further than the bill we passed for reclaiming arid lands? If I remember correctly the substance of the bill we passed reclaiming arid lands, we simply dealt with the lands belonging to the Government and such adjoining lands belonging to private individuals as might be necessary to accomplish the scheme proposed.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAY. In other words, it provided that where the Government owned lands in Wyoming and the other States referred to, the funds arising from the proceeds of the public lands in those States should be utilized to reclaim them, and the Government was authorized to condemn such other lands as the Government found necessary to carry out the scheme.

The reclamation act, as I understand it, did not contemplate that the Government funds should be utilized for the purpose of loaning money to private individuals to develop and reclaim their lands. This bill not only deals with swamp lands for the purpose of reclaiming them, but it also authorizes States, municipalities, and corporations owning these private lands to borrow money from the Government to reclaim them. It strikes me that this scheme goes much further than the scheme we adopted for reclaiming arid lands.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, I tried to make that plain in the previous statement this afternoon. The area that can be brought into an irrigation plan or scheme, as we use that term here in this debate, is easily defined. While I am not as familiar with irrigation matters as I am, perhaps, with this question, I understand that under the irrigation plan the owner of private land has to subordinate his land to the irrigation scheme, and he has to make a certain agreement. From the difficulty of embracing within a fixed limit by Government administration the land contained in the drainage area, instead of trying to provide that the owners should first subject their land to Government control and then receive them back again after the advances by the Government had been made for the drainage, as is substantially the rule in reclamation, in order that the condition might be more easily met, we provided here that the State should pass the necessary law creating drainage districts and authorize the issuance of bonds upon the drainage district; and instead of temporarily holding the title of the land until reimbursed from the sale, the Government would hold the bonds issued upon that drainage district.

That is a question purely of policy for the Senate to determine. I do not think that those of us who perhaps might be said to have this matter more immediately in hand care particularly what disposition the Senate makes of section 5 and section 6.

Mr. CULLOM obtained the floor.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me just a minute in order that we may have this matter in shape?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield to the Senator from Georgia for a moment.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Senator from California if there is not a misprint in the bill? I understand that there is a large amount of public land in California; yet in the enumeration of States I do not find the name "California." Will the Senator tell me whether I am correct in that?

Mr. FLINT. Yes.

Mr. BACON. It is a misprint?

Mr. FLINT. No; it is not a misprint. The proceeds of the sale of lands in the State of California are covered into the reclamation fund. Now, the Senator from Georgia and a number of Senators on the other side of the Chamber——

Mr. BACON. Oh, well——

Mr. FLINT. I want to emphasize it.

Mr. BACON. The Senator need not speak about this side of the Chamber. It is not a party matter.

Mr. FLINT. I want to say that——

Mr. BACON. Oh, no.

Mr. FLINT. Either we have been mistaken in what we have done or we did not understand what those on that side of the Chamber desired. The bill originally was drawn by me providing that the money should be disbursed in the States from which the money was received, but the Senators from South Carolina with other Senators insisted that it should be changed for the reason, they said, that "we can not contribute to this fund, and at the same time we have swamp lands that we think should be drained." Owing to that condition, in the last drainage congress they insisted on an amendment to the bill as set forth in the present measure.

Mr. BACON. What does the Senator say about the Senator from Maine? The Senator insists on speaking about Senators on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. FLINT. Because Senators on that side of the Chamber were those who insisted on the change.

Mr. CLAY. What Senator?

Mr. FLINT. I refer particularly to the late Senator Latimer in the drainage congress. The original bill provided that the money should be expended in the States from which the money was received.

Mr. CLAY. The honorable Senator from South Carolina represented himself.

Mr. FLINT. Not only that, but the entire drainage congress adopted his views and declined to approve of the measure.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. FLINT. When I have finished. He declined to permit an approval of the amendment, and in conference, for the purpose of obtaining the passage of a measure, it was amended so as to provide that the money should be expended generally in all the States from which it was derived.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. One moment. The Senator speaks of Senators on this side of the Chamber. I did not know that party politics had anything to do with the bill. I was criticising the bill, judging it as I read it, on its merits. Surely the Senator from California does not think that a drainage congress could get together and discuss a measure of this kind and find Senators on this side of the Chamber or on the other side either——

Mr. FLINT. I am not attempting to have it bind the Senate in any way. I am simply giving the Senator the reason why those who in conference drafted the bill decided to change it from having the work carried out in the States in which the money was received rather than throughout the entire country.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator, with his permission, that I do not believe the Government of the United States ought to collect money by taxation and loan it to individuals or anybody else for the purpose of carrying on their business. I believe that we ought to confine taxation to the amount of money necessary to pay the legitimate expenses of the Government, and not use it for any other purpose.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CULLOM. I was recognized some time ago for another purpose than the discussion of the pending bill. It is evident that the bill can not be passed to-day, and it is very important that we should have a brief executive session.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to detain the Senate now, but I wish to reply to some things that have been said about the Reclamation Service and to set the matter right if I can. When the bill comes up on another day I will be prepared to speak on it.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 18, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. LATTA, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had, on April 16, approved of the bill (H. R. 17983) for completing the pediment of the House wing of the Capitol.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 6525. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to remove restrictions on Indian allotments in Oklahoma for school-site purposes;

S. 6159. An act to establish a permanent national bison range;

S. 6155. An act to provide for an enlarged homestead;

S. 5950. An act to provide for the disposition of pensions due inmates of the Naval Home;

S. 5616. An act to amend section 3744 of the Revised Statutes;

S. 5505. An act to define and suppress vagrancy within the District of Columbia;

S. 4186. An act creating in the State of Minnesota a national forest consisting of certain described lands, and for other purposes; and

S. 122. An act authorizing the purchase of grounds for the accommodation of public buildings for the use of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. 4063) for the widening of Benning road, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

SAMOAN CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will lay before the House the following message from the President.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the message, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit a report by the Secretary of State concerning this Government's obligation to pay to the Government of Sweden the sum of $375, under the convention between the United States, Great Britain, and Germany for the settlement of Samoan claims, which was signed at Washington on November 7, 1899.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 16, 1908.

The SPEAKER. The message is ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] will take the chair as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the diplomatic appropriation bill.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. Under the order of the House general debate has been limited to five hours.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20345) making appropriation for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To that request, Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to make objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi objects. The Clerk will read.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If there is now five-minute debate, I would like to ask three, four, or five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate has been limited to five hours by the order of the House. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] is recognized.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, one-half of that time fixed by the vote of the House will of course be conceded to the minority side, and that time, under the circumstances, will be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] that time is controlled by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. He will recognize, however, the wishes of the gentlemen on this side.

Mr. COUSINS. What I mean to say is I am willing to yield it in that way. I should not wish to take more than our share of the time. In view of the fact, Mr. Chairman, that some gentlemen wish to speak to other subjects than those pertaining to the propositions of this measure, reserving the balance of my time, and withholding the very few remarks that I deem necessary to make in explanation of the bill, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has no time to yield, but the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in his own right.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I take advantage of the latitude granted in general debate and the courtesy of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] to speak upon the present business depression. I must excuse a treatment of this subject which will be in a measure academic, because of a conviction of the necessity of exact definition and elaborate examination of the causes of economic events. It is better to correctly solve one problem than to jump at a hundred. Great dangers arise from corruption and dishonesty in public and private life. But at the same time we should not omit consideration of the errors which lurk in hasty judgments and superficial thinking.

Last October, in the midst of a period of abounding prosperity, there was a sudden check. Banking circles were overcome with fright. There was a rapid and very disastrous fall in prices. Men were thrown out of employment. Collections became much more difficult. Those who had obligations to meet were subjected to harrowing expedients in providing the funds for payment. In short, there occurred what may be called a "crisis" or "panic."

In our understanding of this subject it is essential that we should realize that there are two classes of these disturbances; one temporary, a matter of days or weeks; the other having a larger degree of permanence and lasting at least for months and probably for years. The first is correctly called a crisis or a panic; the second, a depression. The first is financial in its essential nature, while the depression involves the whole field of production, consumption, and distribution and is essentially industrial and commercial.

Crises come like cyclones—unexpectedly. The signal for them may be a conspicuous failure or a revelation of dishonesty. But we can not perceive their causes or accurately forecast the dates of their appearance. Sometimes they go, leaving no permanent effect, and the industrial craft, like a ship after a storm, though the waves are still high, rides out the rough water and sails on its course. That was true of the Black Friday of September, 1869, when there was a sharp crisis but no ensuing depression. Again, in May, 1901, at the time of the flurry in the stock of the Northern Pacific Railway, there was a serious crisis, but no resulting abatement of prosperity. More frequently, however, these crises are the beginning of a season of diminished activity, characterized by decreased employment of labor and a slackening in all branches of business.

It is sometimes falsely said that the crises cause the depressions. For instance, many have indulged in the delusion that if Jay Cooke had not failed on the 18th day of September, 1873, there would have been no depression in 1873. Others ascribe to the failure of the Knickerbocker Trust Company in October, 1907, all of our existing difficulties. Both alike are entirely in error. These failures but revealed the instability, perhaps the rottenness, which was already in existence, and had they not occurred this instability might have continued until the shock would have been even more severe. Let us, then, observe this very fundamental distinction.

There is also a distinction between depression and poverty. Depression may continue for a few years, but, nevertheless, its occurrence in a country is consistent with a steady growth and onward movement decade by decade. Poverty means a permanent loss of resources and a permanent disadvantage. Much has been said about agricultural depression in England and in Europe. We find even better illustrations in Vermont and some portions of New England, where farms have been abandoned. This, although it does not indicate a condition of want, may be designated in a general sense as poverty. The cultivation of these lands which have been deserted is no longer profitable, either because their productive power has declined or there is destructive competition from newer fields. In this condition there is a loss which is more lasting than that in a depression—in fact a phase of poverty.

We shall not understand the nature of these alternations of favorable and unfavorable periods unless we realize that they are distinctive features of a progressive civilization, where operations have to do with calculations upon future requirements, and where the greatest profits are realized from a successful anticipation of prospective conditions. A French writer who has been more correct than any other in foretelling when crises are to occur wrote, "Paradoxical as it may seem, the riches of nations may be measured by the violence of the crises which they experience." If he had said, "The material growth of nations may be measured by the violence of the crises," he would no doubt have been right. China has no crises nor seasons of depression, Persia has none, Turkey has none, because in these countries there is a permanent condition of stagnation. The Argentine Republic had none until 1890 or thereabouts; but then came a great era of awakening, railway building, improvements of every kind; and this era of exceptional activity, as we should expect, was followed by a crisis which, as an object lesson, is one of the most valuable for study in the whole history of the business world. The same is true of Australia in the year 1893. At the end of a period of apparently unprecedented prosperity a severe crises occurred, with an ensuing depression.

The best example of them all, and the most typical, is our own depression of 1873. At that time there appeared all the distinctive features which pertain to these recurring disturbances, and they stood out with such prominence that the minor and incidental features which are sometimes mistaken for the true causes were obscured. In the first place there was an inflated and irredeemable paper currency, which always proves the fruitful parent of misdirected enterprise and public and private extravagance. In the next place there was, at least throughout the North, a new spirit of nationality, a greater degree of energy and push, due to the successful result of the great struggle. During this period there took place the opening of the Suez Canal, in 1869, an event which marked a great epoch in the development of the commercial world. Also, there had been from 1865 to 1873 more railroad building in the country than in all the years prior to 1865. Everywhere there was enlargement, which led to excessive expenditures in every department of activity. Then came a crash, with the failure of Jay Cooke and of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

In this connection I wish to detail the three general causes of these depressions. The first is public and private extravagance. The world can not make progress in wealth or even maintain a stationary position unless from the surplus of capital there is a sufficient amount set aside for future utilization. If we use up all we are making, it is like a man who eats more food than he can regularly supply. In the same class with this public and private extravagance are enterprises which fail, as did the Northern Pacific Railroad, where, instead of a completed system of transportation, there resulted mere scattered embankments and excavations.

A second cause is a lack of equilibrium between different classes of products, so that there appears a glut of one along with a scarcity of the other. Production in different branches is out of harmony. It was well said by a German writer on this subject that if in the industrial world the arrangement could be as perfect as in a watch factory, so that for every thousand cases there should be a thousand springs and a thousand faces, there would be no recurring seasons of depression. But in the complexity and wide ramifications of our industrial life such harmony is impossible.

If I were to offer a passing opinion about the future development of the United States, I should express the hope that a larger degree of attention might be given to agriculture. There is a very substantial reason for this. In the great haste with which we are using our resources of coal and of timber we must rely more and more upon the produce of the soil, which comes season by season with rain and sunshine. With the quickness of results which are possible in manufacture, and the contrasting slowness in the acquisition of wealth from the cultivation of land, there is a constant tendency to utilize our enormous stock of raw materials for manufacturing. But our development would be more symmetrical if the tastes of our people and their energies were more largely directed to the fruits and products of the farm. Yet this more ideal direction of effort is hardly practicable in a country where everyone is free to follow his own bent.

The third and most substantial cause of these recurring depressions is to be found, as already mentioned, in the distinctive features of progressive industry and in the fact that in a progressive country a very large share of human energy and of capital is expended in preparation for the future, in great works fitted to enlarge our facilities and provide an increased supply of the necessities, comforts, and luxuries of life. These cause depression by reason of the substitution of fixed for circulating capital, because of the absorption of an undue share of the available forms of wealth in something which does not give early return. There are many illustrations—such works as the Hoosac Tunnel, the subways under New York City and the adjacent neighborhood, and the Panama Canal, the largest of them all. Years must elapse before great works of this kind can be utilized. In the meantime the food consumed and the labor and machinery employed might be applied to producing something which would bring an immediate return.

Why, the course of events is practically the same as would arise if, in an industrial community where wages had been paid once or twice a month, it were suddenly announced that thereafter the workman must wait until the end of the year for his pay. There would not only be delay and a necessity for obtaining credit, but a measurable lack of assurance as to whether the workman would ever get his pay at all. In like manner, in all enterprises of exceptional magnitude, not only is the enjoyment of the energy exerted upon them postponed, but it is more or less problematical whether they will prove a success when finished.

This postponed utilization of productive forces marks the difference between a country which stands still and a progressive country like the United States, which looks forward to the future and bases its calculations upon a larger prospective population, and even more upon a larger consumption in proportion to population; for along with our increase of population account must be taken of our increased average consumption. This preparation for larger operations in the future is sure to cause these disturbances in the business world, because human wisdom is not sufficient to resist the impulse for expansion and for speculation which exists under such conditions.

People sometimes say, "Speculation and fraud are the sufficient explanations of panic." Others ascribe the distress to the unusual strain upon credit. But how plainly it appears on a brief analysis that these can not be the responsible causes, but are rather manifestations of potent underlying forces. Men do not speculate for the mere sake of speculation. They do not buy real estate in expectation of a rise unless there is probability of an increased value by which they can realize profits. Robinson Crusoe, out on his island, did not have any incentive to buy corner lots, because there was no visible prospect of a demand for them. Speculation does not come first. Growth comes first. It is the hope of gain that leads men to indulge in speculation, and when they see around them numerous instances of investors who have grown rich over night they will plunge into speculative ventures, and the fever becomes general.

Fraud also is but an incident; it is readily perpetrated when transactions are hurriedly completed and unusual profits are frequent. At such a time men are afraid that some more lucky wight will get ahead of them in making some fortunate investment, and so those who are buying or investing do not scan prospectuses or give attention to the possibility of success with the same care as when profits are small and transactions moderate.

It should not be forgotten that while there is much loss and waste in expenditures made during the active times prior to a depression, most of the objects upon which capital is expended ultimately become useful additions to the wealth of the people. This is well illustrated by the events of the depression of 1873. Very few of the great public or private works of that day were abandoned. The railroads constructed at that time still constitute most valuable portions of the transportation facilities of the country. Everything which was then installed, if after a proper model, is in use to-day. But much of that which was constructed was in advance of the demand, and it was necessary that the country, by increase of population and of consumption, should reach a point where it could profitably use these forms of invested capital which, for the time, were in excess of current need.

In that time of adaptation, between 1873 and 1878, there was dire distress. Overproduction was evident in some branches. We were passing through a period of readjustment, and must await a time when supply and demand should once more correspond. There were distinctive phenomena. Very interesting deductions may be reached by analyzing statistics of exports and imports. The proportion of our exports increased while that of our imports fell off; first, because with less money and impaired credit we were forced to sell more and buy less, and, second, because with the increased equipment for production which had been created prior to the depression we were able to produce in larger amounts and more cheaply, and so to sell more advantageously abroad. But when the day of depression was passed the country went on again with leaps and bounds, unchecked in its splendid career of prosperity.

In the same line with expenditures of capital in preparation for the future is another very important factor. It is the abandonment of old appliances and methods. There is no country in the world where quite so much is thrown upon the scrap heap as in the United States. I remember seeing at a mine near Lake Superior valuable mining machinery, which had been purchased because supposed to be of the very latest pattern, absolutely thrown aside unused because the order for it had scarcely been filled before other machinery was found which was better. Thus apparatus absolutely new was discarded. All this is characteristic of the progressiveness of this country. The influence of such a spirit helps to maintain our position in the forefront as the purveyor of the world's wants.

And yet this abandonment of old appliances is not without its troubles. Much capital is lost. The country once had an equipment for the production of cut nails. It was found that wire nails were preferable in many respects. What was done? We had the old plants for the manufacture of cut nails and a new set for that of wire nails in competition. In time the new practically superseded the old. The capital invested in the cut nail was lost and that invested in the other became utilized, though with some degree of slowness, while the people were becoming accustomed to the new variety.

I have said this much, Mr. Chairman, upon the general nature of crises and depressions in order to meet the assertions so commonly made, that this panic has been due to the action of the President or to the policies of the Republican party or to some other cause of that kind. All these assertions show the disposition to ascribe undue importance to the effects of legislation and political action upon business conditions. True, there are certain elements that we must take into account—the necessity for confidence, the absence of threatening legislation, and of regulations which are contrary to sound economic law. But confidence can not create prosperity. Economic law of a wise and judicious kind is essentially requisite to prosperity, but can not create it. To rely on confidence to bring prosperity would be to rely upon conjecture rather than upon actual facts.

On the other hand, there have been appalling disclosures of dishonesty in the management of large enterprises in this country. It has been necessary to apply the pruning knife with the greatest degree of severity. It has been necessary to cut to the quick. But, I think we all would say that if the question arises between mere prosperity on the one side and a reign of honesty on the other, the reign of honesty must prevail though our prosperity suffer. [Applause.] President Roosevelt has attacked prevalent abuses with vigor, as it was right and essential that he should do. That this disturbance was not due to his action, however, or to any force peculiar to this country, is sufficiently proven by the widespread extent of this commercial and industrial depression, as severe in Germany as here, existing in England as well, and in a measure in France, though the last mentioned is a country which by reason of its conservatism and the stability of its enterprise is freest from these sharp alternations of activity and dullness. France does not increase in population as do the other countries. It can not be compared in material growth with the Argentine Republic or with our own growing country. In addition, there are other reasons why severe crises do not exist there. There is much in the temperament of the people and in a strict bankruptcy law.

Yet I must add in this connection that a revival will be retarded by fear of hostile legislation, especially by the States. To omit to say this would be to fall short of a full portrayal of the situation. It is necessary that there should be a spirit, if not of harmony, at any rate of rational confidence, between the mass of the people and those who engage in great enterprises. The latter must be assured that no spirit of persecution is to be exercised against them. Legislation which is not based upon careful study and consideration of every interest is a blow at confidence and at the business of the country.

After a period of popular indifference and great leniency, in which many fraudulent methods have been successfully pursued, it is inevitable that in the face of numerous revelations of dishonest management the pendulum will swing to the other side, and with an arousing of the public conscience there will be danger of indiscriminate attacks upon successful enterprise. In this, as in everything else, the good sense of the American people must be exercised. Legislation must be based upon a careful regard for the rights of all, with severe penalties for dishonesty and the oppressive use of corporate power, but with a full realization of the necessary magnitude of commercial and industrial undertakings in the United States and the vital importance of securing to honest and intelligent effort its full reward.

It has also been said that the prevention of crises is a question of banking; that if the banks had possessed the right to issue more bank notes last autumn there would have been no crisis. This is quite as wrong as any other contention. The scarcity of currency in its most serious phase followed the fright and did not produce it. No doubt there would have been great relief and the sharp distress would have been very largely alleviated if there had been a more suitable currency system under which securities of stable value might have been protected from sale at ruinous prices, and commodities might have been readily moved to markets.

What should be done in regard to the currency? We ought, in the first instance, to provide paper money that is absolutely safe. Along with many defects in the last forty years there has been one merit in all the money which has circulated among us, and that is its absolute security. It is good not merely in the United States, but it is good all over the globe. The people of this country will not and should not accept any change which introduces an element of doubt in the security for a bank note or other forms of paper money issued. They will not tolerate a régime under which when a man reads in the morning paper that a bank has failed he will take out his pocketbook and look to see if he has any of the bills of that bank. Any plan which stops short of entire assurance of safety is faulty and should be rejected.

In the next place, it should have the quality of flexibility or elasticity, so that it may respond to the varying demands of trade, and this includes the right to withdraw currency from circulation when it is redundant as well as to put it out when it is needed. A model system would know no limitation of withdrawals to nine millions a month. It would allow them to be made to any amount whenever the currency is not needed.

The result of the present system, under which a decrease in volume is so rigidly limited, is that available money is invested in speculation at the time when demands are slack, so that when, under an emergency or increased demand, there is a pressing call for more, there is no more to be obtained. The problem is not so much the sufficiency of the volume of money, as the manner in which it shall be issued and withdrawn.

That agency which can best provide the issuance of currency should issue it. In this connection I do not desire to go beyond the scope of the address which I have outlined, but I must express a preference for a currency issued by some other agency than the Government of the United States. This perilous experiment of Government issue has been tried on both sides of the water, and practically every progressive nation has given it up, and given it up after trial, with the idea that it was not the proper method. There are obvious reasons. The expenditures and receipts of a government naturally balance each other. That which is collected in the way of taxes is to meet expenditures. If collections exceed expenditures, taxation is unnecessarily burdensome. If a government emits paper currency, it must maintain a gold reserve. A hundred and fifty millions is the amount of our gold reserve, which must be maintained by taxation or by issuing bonds. Presumably the strain upon this reserve will be greatest when the fiscal condition of the Government is worst. The Treasury has no fund to provide for the redemption of notes, unless it is maintained by collections foreign to its ordinary and proper levies; a bank has, because, if properly managed, it has a constant incoming stream of payments from maturing discounts and obligations due to it. So that it is a proper function for a bank to issue bills, while, if not an improper function, it is a very dangerous and troublesome one for a government.

How long will this present depression last? How does it differ from others? The depression of 1893 had several distinctive features; a vicious currency system, a fear that we would change to a silver basis, a prevalent feeling abroad and at home that our monetary system was not sound. To this was joined grave apprehension of revolutionary tariff legislation. On the other hand, the depression of 1907 occurred at a time of unparalleled expansion and growth, a time when we could look back twenty years and see that the commerce and wealth of the country had doubled in that period. Whatever you may say of the administration of our national affairs since 1897, you must say that it has been characterized by a disregard of nonessentials, by harmony in those things which make for the growth and prosperity of this country, and by laws which promote wealth and enlarge opportunity—all in an unparalleled degree.

But in this unequaled expansion it was impossible that there should not be a check, and that check came because there was overaction and we had disturbed the normal relations in many branches between supply and demand, although not in others. Products of agriculture, for the most part, continued and very likely will continue at quite as high a level of prices as prior to last October. Securities have suffered most. There has been a general slackening of enterprise all along the line.

The present disturbance will not by any means last as long as the depression of 1893 or that of 1873. What are some of the reasons? In the first place, the enormous yearly addition to the world's supply of gold, the metal which is used for primary money in civilized countries all over the globe. This increase is not without its dangers, because it unduly stimulates enterprise, while at the same time furnishing an impetus to new undertakings and making the meeting of obligations easier. During the civil war business embarrassments in the North were few, because there was a constant increase of paper money which raised prices and rendered less difficult the payment of debts. There was no excuse for any man to fail; hence commercial failures were more rare than in any previous year for which we have accurate statistics. It created an unwholesome condition, under which inflation was sure to become more and more marked, and when the fall came it was all the more serious. But there was that buoyancy which comes from the enhancement of prices and the availability of plentiful supplies of money. The increase of gold, though attended by some of the same dangers, will be much more wholesome in its effect upon industrial development.

Another reason why the present trouble will not prove as severe is the greater degree of skill in business management, the greater degree of cooperation, both national and international, in the management of financial institutions and in all commercial and industrial relations. Not only has there been a development of skill and ability, but those engaged in business have come to see that there is a community of interest among them. Twenty or thirty years ago when a bank was in trouble its competitors looked on with some degree of complacency. They thought, "If this bank should fail, it takes one of our rivals out of business, and we will have a larger field." To-day the welfare of one is regarded as the welfare of all, and unless there is glaring instability or corruption in any financial institution, all join in supporting it. There is the same development in cooperation from an international standpoint. Money crosses over the line from France to Germany and from Germany to France, notwithstanding the traditional animosities between the two countries. When there is a stringency in any country, assistance is rendered from another.

Another reason, particularly applicable to our own country, is the improved access to foreign markets. With better transportation facilities, both at home and with foreign countries, and with wider markets, we have broadened our industrial and commercial horizon. Equally important is the larger quantity and improved quality of that which we have to offer. We no longer supply any "pent-up Utica" or limited area, but our products go to the remotest parts of the globe. Their superiority is being recognized in foreign countries—their greater cheapness, in many instances—so that if at any time there is a surplus of manufactured or other goods at home there are widely extended outlets for them abroad, which will diminish the distress of a season of depression and make it more short-lived.

One other fact, of which I speak with all due deference, is the consolidation of industries. Notwithstanding the tendency of such consolidation toward monopoly, notwithstanding opportunities for oppression and for arbitrary raising of prices, all of which should be met by decisions of the courts and by suitable regulations, this very consolidation has made it possible to check in a greater degree ruinous competition, to forecast the future of the markets and to determine what steps are necessary to minimize depression.

There is another consideration which is very important in this connection. A larger share of our capital and our energy is given to investments which have been tried and found to be successful. Back in 1865 to 1873 the whole West was girdled with railroads, many of which were constructed in unsettled localities, which were virtually as unproductive as desert wastes. For a considerable time after the civil war many new industries were established for the manufacture of iron and steel and in new forms of the textile industry, as well as in a wide range of manufacturing. These were undertaken without assured certainty of favorable results. Now, these fields have been exploited and the enterprises have been found to be profitable, so that capital is expended in a far greater measure for the enlargement of that which has already been tried and found successful and very much less for that which is problematical. This difference is especially noticeable in the case of railroads, upon which the greater share of expenditures is now devoted to the double-tracking of existing lines and to providing enlarged terminals and equipment, instead of, as formerly, to the construction of new roads.

In passing, however, I can not omit to call attention for a moment to the dangers of diminished efficiency of the American employer and the American laborer. Just as the history of olden times is replete with the records of tribes which swept down from the mountain upon the plain and the valley, and subdued those who had not the incentive to labor, or the discipline of self-denial and effort of those in more barren regions, so there is danger that in industrial competition those who have more of a struggle for bread will gain advantages over us. This amounts almost to saying that success here is too easy. How wonderful has been the acquisition of wealth in this new America!

There have been instances in which the poor emigrant, migrating to the New World—he scarce knew why, but with a feeling that he would here enjoy greater equality and opportunity—has achieved such success that he might build a palatial mansion far more stately than the baronial castle of his one-time overlord, and his wife might array herself in garments richer than the coronation robes of a queen. How wonderful have been the triumphs of the American business man! Many can enjoy a magnificence far outshining—

> The wealth of Ormus and of Ind,
> Or where the gorgeous East, with richest hand,
> Showers on her kings barbaric pearl and gold.

But all this abundance has its menace of an extravagant enjoyment of our opportunities, in which lurk dangers of decay. If there is any salutary lesson that we can derive from our industrial and political life, it is that we should practice the old-time virtues of frugality and economy. [Applause.]

In every country there will always be especial attention paid to certain persons who are in the lime light. And who are in the lime light in this country? Is it not those who possess great fortunes, who achieve great success in the fields of industry, of commerce, or of transportation; so that whenever any one of them is guilty of profligacy, or of anything which decreases the respect of his countrymen, it is a blow to the body politic and creates social unrest? The great novelist, M. Balzac, in one of his stories, describes the condition in France on the return of the Bourbons in 1815, how the people looked to them for leadership and for performing some noble service for France. But the returned Bourbons would have no prime ministers except noblemen, and they had no noblemen who were fit to be statesmen. They had none in the ranks of their effete aristocracy who were able to rise to the requirements of the situation. Hence, after a comparatively brief period, their dynasty was thrown down. So, in this country, the responsibilities of great wealth can not be overemphasized. They call for the manifestation of the true spirit of patriotism, of honesty, of regard for all American citizens, rich and poor alike, with an ever-increasing conviction that he who has gained notable success must also achieve notable results for his country and for his kind. [Applause.]

It is in the extravagance and the profligacy which wealth sometimes breeds that I see a danger ahead. Many things have caused unrest and discontent; many factors have caused disturbance in our economic life; yet, after all, though our sky is not cloudless, there never were more auspicious omens for any country than for ours to-day. We realize that when in the past these seasons of diminished activity have come upon us they have proven only temporary, and that now, as then, we shall surmount our difficulties and go forward with still further increased prosperity, and with a larger enjoyment of the comforts and the luxuries of life. Let this be our confidence.

I do not wish my reference to the currency question to be misunderstood. I regard it as of the utmost desirability that this House should do something in the way of currency legislation. I have only sought to refute the claim that lack of proper legislation was responsible for our trouble last fall. There were weightier forces which had been at work. Again, there is much plausibility in the assumption that if the crisis had been longer postponed it would have been more severe when it came. This is also a valid argument to meet the accusation of those who say that anything done by the President or the Administration brought on this difficulty. It would not have been well to have allowed dishonesty to run riot. Nor would it have been well to have allowed this expansion to continue unchecked, because the longer dishonesty continued and the more prolonged this expansion, the greater the final disturbance and disaster when the crisis came. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the chairman of the committee the balance of the time allotted me, unless some one desires to ask a question.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I request the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] for one hour.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, it has been said that there is more dynamite under the race question than under any other question ever before the American people. No matter how true this may have been in the past, it seems now no longer true. I might multiply illustrations to prove this, but the fact that a few weeks ago it was discussed on this floor, vigorously, but without acrimony or even unpleasantness of any character, and the conduct and apparent trend of the present campaign for the Republican nomination for President are sufficient to demonstrate the fact that the negro is no longer, as he once was, the "ward of the nation." As a free man, he is 44 years old, and the country at large looks upon him as full grown. Upon this fact the whole country, North and South, is to be congratulated.

I propose to-day to present to the American people one phase of the question that has been overlooked. Five years ago I was invited to deliver the annual address at the commencement of the Georgia School of Technology. Speaking then to a school of young white men who were being educated along technical lines, I could but let my mind go over the field of possible future competition between the white men and the black men of America. I spoke what was in my mind and heart, with malice toward none and charity to all, and my only excuse for imposing it on the House to-day is the verification since of so many of the suggestions then put forward. I said:

There is a question now pressing hard upon all of us in the South, and in a manner which makes it of peculiar importance to young men who are about to become a part of the great industrial world. I saw in a reputable magazine, published in one of the Northern States, some days since an article on technical education and manual training in the South. Knowing that I would soon speak to you, I began to read it with interest, hoping to get some thought for your edification. Imagine, if you can, my surprise and chagrin when I found two negro schools only cited as examples of what technical education is doing for the South. Ignoring this great institution and others of like character in neighboring States, two negro schools were named as representing the great advance of the South along lines of technical education and manual training. This is not all. I have been reading of late in some of our Northern and few of our Southern newspapers solemn and heavy editorials, urging manual training and technical education for the negroes of the South as the solution of the race question.

In the ponderous language of superior wisdom these gentlemen discuss the accomplishments of certain prominent negroes along this line, all solemnly assuring us in conclusion that this is the solution of the race problem. Northern newspapers and Northern philanthropists, if they believe as they profess, may be correct in their position. They profess to believe in the equality of all people and all races, modified only by opportunities and achievements. I shall discuss the question, however, from the standpoint of a Southern white man, who does not believe this any more than he believes the "leopard can change his spots." The negro is with us, the race question is ours, and it is for use to solve in the best interest of the Southern white man and with all possible tolerance for the negro. By us it will be solved. Others may aid us or may hinder us in its final solution by example or advice, well meant or otherwise. It will still be our problem.

I lay down the broad proposition which I do not believe will meet with denial in any State of large negro population (indeed I do not believe it will meet with honest opposition from any white man anywhere), that the negro race is not the equal of the white race, and never can become so, no matter what its environments or accomplishments. Just as in the struggle during the thousands of years gone by, the white man has led, so will he continue to lead to the end of time. The assertion that manual training and technological education for the negro will solve the race question is itself a declaration of the inferiority of the negro. It does suggest the possibility of equality with the white man for the future, however.

It declares equality now for the negro with the large number of white men engaged in pursuits other than the so-called learned professions. But they tell us that this will solve the race question. If so, then the sooner we cease all controversy over it and unite our energies toward a consummation so devoutly to be wished the better for us and for the black man of the Southern States. If, however, it is not the solution of the question, and if it will, as I know, only go to "weave a more tangled web" in our already tangled civilization, then it behooves us to search earnestly for the solution if solution there be. I shall discuss the question to-day in perfect loyalty to my own race, and at least, in perfect kindness to the other and weaker race, remembering always that—

> When self the quivering balance shakes
> 'Tis rarely right adjusted.

Since mankind grew from families into tribes and these began their predatory incursions into the territory belonging to their neighbors, there has always been a race question sharply at issue somewhere in the world. Profane history abounds with descriptions of race wars, and the great book of books is filled from Genesis to Revelation with narratives of race antagonisms and racial antipathies. We are told that Cain went into the Land of Nod for a wife and I am not sure that evidence is wanting there of parental objection on account of race or color.

The history of Egypt affords us more illustrations of racial antipathies and race wars than the history of any other country. The rich valley of the Nile has been from remotest antiquity a bone of contention among the people of southwestern Asia, northern Africa, and all Europe.

The civilizations of Egypt have been at once the admiration and astonishment of all succeeding generations. The deeds of her soldiers and statesmen have been preserved in stone and emblazoned in brass. We can read her history from her ruins. Like our own people, they have always been a little extravagant and often grandiloquent in relating their accomplishments.

We are told that on a stone near Mount Sinai, erected by himself, is the representation of an Egyptian king, smiting the enemy, and describing himself as the "Smiter of Nations," the "Great God," and "The Lord of Justice.'

That history does sometimes repeat itself, we see in the airs of the heads of two great nations of very modern times. One of them is an emperor; the other shall be nameless here. [Laughter and applause.] The deeds of her different kings are celebrated by columns and obelisks all over the present territory of Egypt, Palestine, Asia Minor, Scythia, and Thrace. Looking at it from this distance, it would seem that no civilization before or since has surpassed that of which I speak.

A neighboring people, a different race, saw and coveted this fair land, and the Shepherd King with an army "Like unto an army of locusts" laid waste her beautiful gardens, destroyed her great cities, and demolished her magnificent temples.

He swept away as far as he could every vestige of Egypt's former civilization. A few tombs and obelisks were left, the only monuments to her former glory. For five hundred years that race ruled over Egypt.

During all this time the races kept separate and distinct. One was dominant, the other subservient. When at last the aboriginal race succeeded in defeating and driving out the invaders of five hundred years before, it was a victory of racial instinct and race pride. The race problem was settled.

It was the dream of every ancient Egyptian ruler to add Ethiopia to his dominions. Army after army went down from Egypt only to be hacked in pieces and hurled back in defeat. The last effort of Egypt to absorb Ethiopia met with such disastrous defeat that the Ethiopian king became the ruler of Egypt. The Ethiopians then governed, the Egyptians served.

Ethiopian rule was at length overthrown and Ethiopia became, for the first time, a province of Egypt. Again the Egyptian ruled and the Ethiopian served. During all this period the "Ethiopian did not change his skin," and pride of race still lived in both peoples.

The Ethiopian of to-day is as far removed from the Egyptian, although both are subject to British rule, as he was 2,000 years ago. To-day the white man rules in Egypt, others serve.

The Punic wars were race wars. The implacable hatred between the people of southern Europe and northern Africa arose from nothing except the racial instinct planted in the hearts of both by the Creator.

When the first Punic war ended and a treaty of peace was made, we are told that it was engraved on brass, and, amid a great flourish of trumpets, it was deposited in the capitol at Rome, so that all the world might see and know the deep and abiding love between the dark people of Carthage and the white men of Rome. The great race question was once again settled.

I can see the Peace Commission sitting at Rome, somewhat like our many Indian commissions. I can hear the assurances of love and affection from one commissioner to another as the bowl of peace was passed around, and I can see the glad peace jubilee at Carthage and at Rome over the tidings of great joy, announcing the final settlement of the race question, which had for so long disturbed their world.

That peace lasted a little longer than the time required for the commission to dissolve and the commissioners to return to their homes.

Following that for one hundred and twenty-five years there was bitter war between those people, ending only with the complete destruction of the Carthaginian nation and the wiping of the great city of Carthage from the map. Again a race question was solved.

The Hebrews were seventy years captives in Babylon, and the Book of Daniel is full of the race troubles of that unhappy period; yet, after seventy years in slavery, they returned to Canaan, the same proud race who "hanged their harps upon the willows and sat down by the rivers of Babylon" seventy years before to "weep when they remembered Zion."

They were five hundred years in Egypt. The Angel of the Passover, notwithstanding, overlooked no Hebrew home as he passed over the land to mark the way for the death angel who followed him on that terrible night of the plague of the first born.

When Moses marshaled the hosts to seek the promised land there was no difficulty in determining who should go.

When the Red Sea rolled back, leaving the dry road to pass over, none but Jews walked through; and when Pharaoh's host, pressing hard upon them, was engulfed by the closing waters, no Jew was among the dead.

During all these long years the Egyptians ruled and the Jews served. Hard Egyptian taskmasters daily drove suffering Hebrews to the making of "bricks without straw."

Coming down to later times, one of the strongest illustrations of race antipathy and its converse is found in the history of Spain. The old Kingdom of Spain was a hotbed of Jewish oppression. No Jew had any rights which a Spaniard was bound to respect. The Jew was subject to the whims and caprices of his neighbors of Spanish blood, and had no redress for any wrong anywhere.

In the sixteenth century the army of Mohammed having grown restless for other worlds to conquer swept from southwestern Asia into Africa. Completing the subjugation of northern Africa, their eyes turned in avarice to the fair fields and lovely gardens of Spain. They swarmed across the narrow water which rolled between the continents, and the proud nobles of Spain surrendered to the Arabs.

The conquerors from the desert were the children of Hagar, and related by blood to the children of Sarah, who had suffered Spanish persecution during so many years.

Conditions were at once reversed; the Jew, who for many years had served the Spaniard, at once became a master, the equal in every way of his kinsman from across the sea; his every right was now respected and he in turn saw the humiliation of Spain's proud grandees, who now had no rights which Jew or Moor was bound to respect.

The Spaniard persecuted the Jews; the Moors subjugated Spain and placed the Jew in power and affluence. The Moor was his kinsman. The Spaniard belonged to another and different race. The Spaniard ruled and the Jew served. The Moor and the Jew ruled and the Spaniard served. Is there a better illustration of the maxim that "blood is thicker than water?"

It may be insisted that the world has advanced beyond every illustration I have given. If so let him who believes it consult current history. I have but to call your attention to the hatred between the Celt and the Briton, the riots which mark every meeting of the Austro-Hungarian Parliament, between the Germans and the Slavs, the two distinct races which make up the dual empire now tottering to its fall, and the hatred which all the world knows exists in India to-day between the natives and the British.

Burnham, in his account of British rule in India, tells us that the lines between Briton and native are more closely drawn to-day than ever before, and that race hatred deepens as the years roll on.

The deplorable conditions in Macedonia and Armenia, where the blood of murdered Christians daily cries aloud to high heaven, speak in language more eloquent than words of the powerful prejudice which drives the Turk to oppress and murder all not of his blood.

The cry that stirs all Russia more than any other to-day is "the Turk must get out of Europe."

The Frenchman hates the German, not because of Metz but because of the difference in blood of the two great races of Continental Europe.

All history is made up of stories of race pride and race antipathy. From the time the world began all races have had in their hearts love for their kind and have constantly struggled to gain and maintain supremacy over every other race. It is the law of nature, and is not to be overcome by the edict of a sovereign or the pronunciamento of a legislature. It can not be educated or refined away. It had its inception in the birth of the races. At their death only will it die.

We of the present generation, both white and black, were born into the conditions which exist in the South. These conditions are not to be charged against either of us. He was our slave. He is now our political equal by the same power of law which made him our property. Can he continue our equal before the law and our inferior in fact, without endangering our social fabric? This is at last the question which ever intrudes itself upon us, and is really the race question of this day and this people.

As I said at the outset, it is now asserted by many of our friends in the North, and admitted by some of our neighbors, that the settlement of the race question must come from manual training and technical education for the negro. They tell us that his and our future happiness depends on teaching his eye and his hand. He must be taught to labor with these. According to them, his hand is to be encouraged and his head discouraged. This all sounds very well at an educational rally.

The great fact is overlooked that, after all, the brain directs the eye and the hand, or its work is of no value. The manual laborer is a brain worker just as if he held the pen rather than the jackplane. The imaginary line between the so-called brain worker and the manual laborer was drawn by the brain worker himself, and it only marks a difference in the field of brain activities.

One puts his thoughts on paper, his conceptions on canvas and in marble; the other works with wood and steel and iron. All are directed by the same intelligence, and individuals succeed or fail in accordance with the brain power behind the hand.

I confess I can not understand how you may successfully encourage the hand and the eye without at the same time developing the brain which must direct them both.

If I am mistaken in my opinion, however—if this can be done—and the line to be laid down for the limit of progress of the negro be religiously hewn to by him, let me ask what you propose to do about the bitter competition which will follow between him and the thousands of our young men who are not fortunate enough to possess the means to secure a liberal education and entrance into a learned profession or, who, like you, have determined that technical education and manual training will better prepare you to build up the waste places of our land?

Our Southern friends who advocate this remarkable proposition insist that the negro must not compete with our so-called brain workers.

According to this propaganda, however, he must be educated to compete with the white carpenter, the white blacksmith, the white factory boss, the white farm superintendent, but must not be allowed to enter into competition with our doctors, our lawyers, and other professional men. Our friends have not followed their thoughts on this subject to their logical and inevitable conclusion.

The number of men and women, white and black, in the United States engaged in professional pursuits is 1,258,538. All other pursuits combined equal 27,814,696. There are 114,460 lawyers, 132,002 physicians and surgeons, 30,038 journalists, and 446,133 teachers and college professors in the United States.

Our colleges are turning out about 6,000 doctors and 5,000 lawyers every year. Statisticians estimate that 2,500 doctors and 3,000 lawyers per annum would serve to keep the ranks of these two professions full. Therefore, there is a surplus every year of 3,500 doctors and 2,000 lawyers. That both professions are crowded to that degree where there is no longer room even at the top is patent to the most careless observer.

If other professions are equally overcrowded it will not be many years before the ranks of the manual laborer or the tradesman, who, though not generally classed as such, is himself a manual laborer, will be largely swollen by the addition of failures in the professional classes.

If the figures given be correct, and they can not be successfully contradicted, let me ask you how a solution, or anything approaching a solution of the race problem, is to come from negro technical education and manual training. It would serve only to put him into active competition with the vast majority of our white people, excepting only that small professional class where competition is now so great that the "survival of the fittest" is no longer the unvarying law.

If the negro is to be educated by us to compete with the great majority of our people; if he is to be thus made the competitor of our artisans, why should our artists be immune? I ask in all candor, Does any man who knows anything of the race question from actual contact and experience believe that this would even tend to a settlement of the problem?

It would undoubtedly be better for the negro, provided it brought with it a field for his activities. This it can not do, and without this it would be a curse not only to the white man of the South, but to the negro as well—yes, a thousand times over.

The difference between the Northern and the Southern man on this question is this: The Northern man, outside of the professions, has been brought up to look upon his hand as worth so much to himself and his family. The labor of his hand will produce much or little, according to its training. This is his stock in trade. It is his capital. Upon the strength and skill of that depends his progress in the world. The Japanese, the Chinaman, or the negro, with a cheaper hand, comes in competition with him. At once, as the result of this competition, his hand cheapens in value, his stock in trade is reduced, his capital cut down, his income cut off. He resents this and race riots follow in our Northern cities.

The environment of the Southern white man for a long time was different. For years the negro did all of the manual labor of the South, and he was in no sense a competitor of the white man. This condition existed for the many years before the war. Since his freedom his presence in the South in great numbers has been and is a social menace, overshadowing every other phase of the race question and, indeed, every other question.

The breaking of the social barriers established by the white man of the South for the preservation of our civilization is the forfeiture of the black man's right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We of the South all see and understand this.

His entrance into competition with the white laborer of the North is a forfeiture of his right, by the sweat of his brow, to earn his bread. The white laboring men of the North all see and understand this. A distinction with very little difference.

Industrial conditions in the South have not been at a standstill during all these years since the war. We are no longer a purely agricultural and professional people. We are now largely manufacturers. More of our young men are every year entering the ranks of manual labor.

Advocates of this proposition are assuming two impossible conditions. First, they assume that the negro can be educated up to a line and held there (whether voluntarily, by law, or by public opinion I do not know); second, that technical education of the negro will eliminate competition between him and his white neighbor. Neither will nor can be done.

Educate the negro to compete with the white laboring man and you may as well open wide the door to every other avenue of thought and action. Make him the competitor of this large majority of our people, North and South, and expect peace!

> You may as well go stand upon the beach
> And bid the main flood 'bate his usual height;
> You may as well forbid the mountain pines
> To sway their high heads and make a noise
> When they are fretted by the gusts of Heaven.

[Applause.]

Our friends in the North have this view of the labor end of the negro problem, and they are about persuaded to take the southern view of the social question. Some of our Southern people, in an honest effort, no doubt, to meet our Northern friends halfway on the race problem, are about to sacrifice the very principle of white supremacy—that feature of the race question which is best understood in the North. They have not thought. As I have said, we of the present generation found the negro here, and the negro found us here. Neither of us deserves any particular credit or discredit for that fact.

The negro lovers of the North are as far wrong as the few negro haters of the South. I am discussing the question as the friend of the white man; I am discussing it as a white man to white men, all of whom are interested in the future of our race, and all of whom love the land which gave us birth. There is no fear for the white race in the South. This land and this people are our present burden. I harbor no hatred for the negro. I recognize the faithfulness of the black man to his master in time of war, but I can not forget the horrible orgies of reconstruction days. I deeply pity his misfortunes, but I am for white supremacy first. There is a political maxim—

> The utter extermination of a race of people is inexpressibly sad, yet if its existence endangers the welfare of mankind it is fitting that it should be swept away.

This is the Briton's defense for his heartless conquests in every quarter of the globe.

The only justification ever offered for our conquest of the Philippines is based on this historical maxim.

It is cited here, not because I believe it will ever be necessary in the South; not that I believe that the white people of the South will ever need or desire to invoke it. I cite it in justification of what is, in my opinion, the only other solution of the race question ever proposed.

The Hebrews were commanded to exterminate the races of Canaan. Nations have time and again been wiped from the map and races swept out of existence in pursuance of this great natural law. But as I have said there is no necessity for, and no danger of destroying the negro race in the Southern States. I would not be misunderstood. I say I speak to-day as the friend of the Southern white man, and I am not the enemy of the Southern negro, I simply stand for the supremacy of our race, let is cost what it may.

We could not prevent the education of the negro if we would, neither can we direct the lines upon which it shall proceed nor where it shall end.

Determination to be educated has its reward in final success everywhere.

But for God's sake let us not depend on the technical education of the negro to solve the race problem. This proposed solution will accomplish only one of two things—it will either drive the great majority of our young white men into other States, or, it will create the most terrible race war ever written of in the history of the world. I do not believe our young men will be driven from their homes. If perchance they should refuse to live in a land with conditions so deplorable, and if, like their fathers before them, they should go out and build new homes for themselves in the wilderness, we would have left to us a land made up of two classes of people, a professional class of whites and a laboring class of blacks. To see the absurdity of this condition requires only that I call attention to it.

It is impossible for the two races to live together many years longer on terms of exact political equality and peace. It has never been done and never will be done. Where two races have lived together without amalgamation, one has always been absolutely dominant and the other absolutely subservient. One has ruled; the other has served. The white man rules in the South to-day.

The Indian has faded before the white man because he would not accept the white man's terms. The negro has lived thus far with the white man, because he has willingly accepted the humble seat given him by his white neighbor.

This must continue, or separation must come. Social equality and amalgamation are not to be thought of.

The great Teutonic race to which we belong has, through its various branches, developed more of race pride than any race on God's footstool.

Their restless energy has carried them into all climates and among all people. They have mixed with all, amalgamated with none lower than they. They have consorted with all, mated with none of an inferior race. Race pride is so strong with the men of this race that it rises beyond and above even parental love, thought to be the strongest of human feelings. There is no danger of amalgamation.

Then what must be if we are to live together in peace? As I have intimated, there must be perfect submission from one and complete control by the other.

The Anglo-Saxon, cradled in war, full of endurance and courage, self-sacrificing, glorying in his manhood and the achievements of centuries, will never yield the land which is his by all the ties which can bind man to his home.

It was bought with the blood of our fathers and, please God, it will not be yielded up by the sons. There is not a white man in any one of the so-called negro States who would not gladly see the repeal of the constitutional amendments making the negro a citizen and a voter. While this is true there is a disposition in some quarters of the South to laugh at the efforts of earnest patriotic men in this direction. There is no complete salvation for the South outside of this one thing.

Many gentlemen say it is impossible. The same gentlemen would very probably have said ten years ago that present conditions and feelings of the people North and South on the social side of this question were impossible.

This is absolutely necessary to our final salvation. Everything else is a miserable makeshift, only to tide us over to the time when public opinion everywhere will approve of the repeal of these amendments and the correction of these terrible mistakes.

A union half white and half black can live no more than a union "half slave and half free."

Separation of the races would be best for white and black alike; but it seems that neither race is yet ready for that. The time will be, however, in the years to come when the manhood of the country, North and South, white and black alike, will demand it.

Separation will not come in our generation, but many of us here to-day will live to see the repeal of these amendments. Separation will follow disfranchisement as the night the day.

The cupidity of the white man and the stupidity of the negro will delay this consummation, but it is sure to come, and I believe as peacefully as the sun will rise to-morrow morning.

As I said, however, that is not to be now. Neither race is yet prepared for it, and only disfranchisement is left to insure the white control so necessary to the peace and prosperity of the South.

The negro could not be less a factor in the political life of the South if disfranchised than he now is. No one need fear the oppression of the negro if denied by law the privilege of voting. He is only a menace and a scarecrow now; not a factor in determining political issues. His rights are guaranteed to him now only through white judges and white jurors in all of the States of the South. That will not be changed by repealing these amendments. The privilege of voting is now scantily exercised by the negro in all of the Southern States.

Political privileges are not granted as a matter of right. They are either granted by grace, or they are the achievements of the individual, and eternal vigilance and unfailing courage is their price. Some men are born free, some are made free, and some achieve freedom. The first and last classes are those who are really free, and constant struggle is the price of preserving their privileges. Those made free by the sacrifices of others, possessing that which was obtained through no personal effort or sacrifice, neither understand nor appreciate its meaning. Constant struggle is the price of life. That which we call the business world is an everlasting warfare governed by the inexorable law of the "survival of the fittest."

Idealists confidently look forward to the time when all men will live in perfect peace—when all races will dwell together in perfect harmony.

All history teaches the contrary; all nature tells us that it is an impossible condition. The king snake braves the deadly fangs of the rattler not alone because he belongs to a different family. He kills him to satisfy his appetite as well.

All nature feeds and fattens on nature. This will continue to the end.

When our fathers were oppressed they made their way to other lands. They faced the dangers of the floods, the wild beasts of the wilderness, and the hatred of brave and strong and crafty savages, as they carved these great States and built up this great Union.

If the negro in the South is oppressed either by law or in fact, let him follow the white man's example. Let him find and make for himself a home. He need not complain of poverty because the poverty of the negro can not surpass that of the Pilgrim Fathers and the debt-ridden cavaliers who first settled on our shores.

"Be ye not unequally yoked together" is as applicable to us as to the Corinthian Christians, for "what communion is there between light and darkness?"

The repeal of the constitutional amendments conferring suffrage will be only preliminary to final separation. Disfranchisement will come first in the States of the South. It will finally become law in all of the States. The negro will turn for a home to those States guaranteeing greatest privileges to him. As his numbers increase in these States and he encroaches more upon the privileges of the white man, he will in turn be disfranchised there and will seek other homes, until finally, under the impulse of race pride, which, during these many years in the wilderness, will grow strong within him, he will establish somewhere with the white man's help, an abiding place. This is the only final solution of this question.

Think not that we can accomplish that which the Lord of Hosts would not undertake in Egypt. All of the plagues of Egypt did not secure to the Jews their natural, to say nothing of their political, rights, and not until they had wandered for forty years in the wilderness under the rod of God's chastisement did they finally reach the land of Canaan and begin to write their glorious history. Let the negro take courage from their example.

Finally, the greatest struggle of all will one day come, the great contest for supremacy between the white and the colored races of the world. By colored I do not mean the negro races alone.

In that contest of which I speak on one side will be arrayed all the white men of the world and on the other all the yellow, brown, and black men of the world. When that conflict comes, will the American negro ally himself with us? Remembering the wrongs to himself and his fathers from the time when Noah sent Ham out with a curse upon him until to-day, he will forget that he is an American citizen and remember only that he is a negro. He will stand, as you will stand, with his own race, with his own color, with his own blood, against what is to him an alien race, an alien color, and an alien blood.

To weaken the white race in the South is to weaken the white race everywhere. To strengthen us is to strengthen the arm which must one day be tested in this great contest for world control between the white and the colored races.

The destruction of Southern civilization will not be the ruin of the Southern States alone.

"Think not that thou in the king's house can escape more than all the Jews." It will reach, in its powerful and baneful effects, the great States of the North, and their civilization will suffer with ours. I do not fear the destruction of either Southern or Northern civilization.

Our fellow-citizens of Caucasian blood who are not now struggling with this problem as we are will not refuse to listen to their brethren of the South. We are all of the same blood. We have fought the same fight to reclaim the wilderness and to establish and guarantee life and liberty to ourselves and our children.

For every Lexington there is a King's Mountain. For every Saratoga there is a Yorktown. For every Gettysburg there is a Bull Run. For every Shiloh there is a Chickamauga. Bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh, with these glorious memories, the common heritage of all, they will not finally refuse to lend us their aid in solving this, the most serious problem ever given to any people. [Applause.]

I said this nearly five years ago. Almost daily happenings in all parts of the Union confirm the correctness of my views.

Mr. Ray Stannard Baker, a Northern man, who has studied this question intelligently, both North and South, is publishing a series of articles in the American Magazine, and I quote from the March, 1908, number of that magazine:

> Hostile physical conditions of life in the North are not the only difficulties that the negro has to meet. He thought he left prejudice behind in the South, but he finds it also showing its teeth here in the North. And, as in the South, a wide difference is apparent between the attitude of the best class of white men and the lower class.
> Different degrees of prejudice, it is true, are apparent in the two sections. In the South the social and political prejudice, the natural result of the memories of slavery and reconstruction, of the greater mass of the negro population and of the backward economic development is stronger. In the North, on the other hand, comparatively little social and political prejudice is apparent; but the negro has a hard fight to get anything but the most subservient place in the economic machine.

> One of the first white men with whom I talked (at Indianapolis) said to me with some impatience: "There are too many negroes up here; they hurt the city." Another told me of the increasing presence of negroes in the parks, on the streets, and in the street cars. He said: "I suppose sooner or later we shall have to adopt some of the restrictions of the South."

In Boston, of all places, I expected to find much of the old sentiment. It does exist among some of the older men and women, but I was surprised at the general attitude which I encountered. It was one of hesitation and withdrawal. Summed up, I think the feeling of the better class of people in Boston (and elsewhere in northern cities) might be thus stated: We have helped the negro to liberty; we have helped to educate him; we have encouraged him to stand on his own feet. Now, let's see what he can do for himself. After all, he must survive or perish by his own efforts.

In short, they have "cast the bantling on the rocks."

Though they still preserve the form of encouraging the negro, the spirit seems to have fled. Not long ago the negroes of Boston organized a concert at which Theodore Drury, a colored musician of really notable accomplishments, was to appear. Aristocratic white people were appealed to and bought a considerable number of tickets; but on the evening of the concert the large block of seats purchased by white people was conspicuously vacant. Northern white people would seem to be more interested in the distant southern negro.

* * * * * * *

In the North the negro finds himself in an intense industrial atmosphere where relationships are more strictly impersonal and business-like. What he gets he must pay for. Charity exists on a large scale, as I shall show later, but it is the sharp, inquiring, organized charity of the North.

* * * * * * *

In short, coming North to find a place where he will be treated more like a man and less like a serf, the negro discovers that he must meet the competitive struggle to which men of the working class are subjected in the highly developed industrial system of the North.

There are counties and towns where no negro is permitted to stop overnight. At Syracuse, Ohio, Lawrenceburg, Ellwood, and Salem, Ind., for example, negroes have not been permitted to live for years. If a negro appears he is warned of conditions, and if he does not leave immediately he is visited by a crowd of boys and men and forced to leave. A farmer who lives within a few miles of Indianapolis told me of a meeting, held only a short time ago by thirty-five farmers in his neighborhood, in which an agreement was passed to hire no negroes, nor to permit negroes to live anywhere in the region.

White ministers sometimes have spasms of conscience that they are not doing all they should for the negro.

Let me tell two significant incidents from Philadelphia. The worst negro slum in that city is completely surrounded by business houses and the homes of wealthy white people. Within a few blocks of it stand several of the most aristocratic churches of Philadelphia. Miss Bartholomew conducts a neighborhood settlement in the very center of this social bog. Twice during the many years she has been there white ministers have ventured down from their churches. One of them said he had been troubled by the growing masses of the ignorant colored people.

"Can't I do something to help?"

Miss Bartholomew was greatly pleased and cheered.

"Of course you can," she said heartily. "We are trying to keep some of the negro children off of the streets. There is plenty of opportunity for helping with our boys' and girls' clubs and classes."

"Oh, I didn't mean that," said the minister. "I thought, in cases of death in their families, we might offer to read the burial service."

And he went away and did not see the humor of it.

Another minister made a similar proposition; he wanted to hold a Sunday school for colored people. He asked Miss Bartholomew, anxiously, where he could hold it.

"Why not in your church in the afternoon?"

"Why, we couldn't do that," he exclaimed; "we should have to air all the cushions afterwards!"

HUMAN NATURE NORTH AND SOUTH.

In fact, the more I see of conditions North and South, the more I see that human nature north of the Mason and Dixon's line is not different from human nature south of the line.

Mr. Chairman, the South needs the labor of the negro, but we want none of the riffraff of Europe to supplement it.

While we would give heartiest welcome to all from our sister States who, understanding American institutions, make good citizens everywhere, we are absolutely and unconditionally opposed to indiscriminate immigration. The South is being rapidly populated now in the good old-fashioned way, and if left alone to settle our social and domestic problems, we shall, within the next decade, show to the world the richest and greatest, as she is now the fairest, domain on the face of the earth.

Let all thinking men everywhere ponder well these words. [Applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, what I have to say might be properly said in the five-minute debate on the bill, but because I want to speak of one or two questions affecting the diplomatic corps with a little more fullness I have decided to address my remarks to the committee at this time.

There is a special reason for this, because a recent diplomatic incident, familiar to us all, in reference to our legation in Berlin, has brought before the Congress and the people of the country largely the question on which I purpose to briefly speak.

I am very sorry, Mr. Chairman, that there is not included in this bill any provision for the purchase of embassies for our foreign representatives, but I do believe that either through the diplomatic appropriation bill or through some separate legislation ere long that need—a need which I think is recognized by many to whom a few years ago it would have been a new idea—can be supplied. The people of this country do not desire their diplomatic representatives to make any excessive display, but I think the feeling is universal that the representatives of our Government should be properly, decorously, decently housed in a manner befitting the country they represent.

Almost every great nation except our own has a permanent residence for its representatives in the great capitals, and the lack of that presents our own country in a way that sometimes is not merely squalid, but is almost ludicrous. At one time our representative is found in a palace; at another time, at the same capital, the representative of the same country is found in a hotel or a boarding house or a pension. More than that, in every great capital there is some building to which the citizens of other nations can turn, where they can find the home of their own land in a foreign capital. There is hardly one of us here that has not experienced the sensation of asking in Paris, in London, in Berlin, or any of the great capitals, "Where is the embassy, where is the home of the American people," and finding that not one person in one thousand could tell us; the reason being that in none of those capitals is there a permanent place where the representatives of our country at all times can be found.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a further consideration in connection with this, arising out of the inadequate salaries that, as everybody recognizes, are paid to our diplomatic representatives. No one desires that our representatives abroad should live in a style of offensive splendor, but, on the other hand, every one recognizes the fact that they should live in a way that is decorous, proper, and fitted to the social usages of the place.

I presume, Mr. Chairman, that a large part of our diplomatic representatives are obliged to pay for the rent of the house which they occupy probably one-third of the entire salary which they receive, and some pay a much larger sum. The results of that are in a twofold way unfortunate. The man of very great wealth left to his own resources and his own taste, selects what he sees fit, and chooses a residence far beyond the means of most, and is surrounded by a splendor that might be called palatial. I think that, perhaps, to some extent, is unfortunate. He is succeeded by a man of moderate means, whose only resources are found in his salary, and who is by necessity obliged to occupy a residence that, compared with that of his other associates, is not only modest but sometimes unseemly.

The result of purchases by the Government of residences for its representatives would work a double gain. It would restrict the possibility of what we might call undue splendor. It would help the man of moderate means and by paying a portion of his expenses largely assist him in making ends meet. In other words, the building that should be selected should not be so great or magnificent that only a millionaire could live in it, because you may buy a palace, and give it to a man rent free, and yet he must be a millionaire to be able to live in it. On the other hand, they should not be so small as to seem squalid when representing a nation as great and as rich as ours. A building should be selected and purchased, that would be decorous and sufficient for the dignity of the Government, and yet not too great for those living, not with excessive splendor, but with just propriety. The possibility of what we may perhaps call undue display would be reduced—the condition of the man of moderate means would be improved. In other words, the man of moderate means would find it easier to make the ends meet, and the multimillionaire would find the possibility of social display somewhat checked. Both of these, I think, would be regarded as desirable results by the American people.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do all the other great nations of the earth own their embassies generally in foreign capitals?

Mr. PERKINS. Generally they do. It is the ordinary rule.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman think that this proposition which he advocates would do very much good without raising the salary of our foreign ambassadors and ministers?

Mr. PERKINS. It would do just this amount of good: The salary, for instance, of an ambassador is $17,500. Let us take a man who has no private means. If he has not to pay out of his salary four or five thousand dollars rent—and it is almost impossible in a great capital like London or Berlin or Paris to obtain a proper residence for less than that—if the building is furnished him free, he is $5,000 better off. It may be that in addition to furnishing these buildings the Government will find it requisite to do what is done by most other great nations—that is, make some allowance to its representatives for the expense of furnishing and maintaining the house. But to a considerable extent, certainly, it will relieve the problem and bring this additional advantage, that the unfortunate difference in splendor between some enormously rich men and other representatives who follow them may be lessened.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One other question. Does the gentleman think, really, now, that it makes any more difference what kind of a house our ambassadors and ministers live in, in respect to their influence, than it does about the hotel that we board at here in Washington or the residence we occupy or the place where we live, with reference to our influence in this House?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; I think it does. I think the situation is quite different. Here in this House a man's station is made entirely by what he does and says in the House. I do not know of any body in which I think the effect of a man's wealth or his mode of living outside of the body is of less importance than in the House of Representatives, and that that should be so is certainly very much to the credit of the body. [Applause.]

Mr. STERLING. Have any of the foreign nations proposed to build or own buildings here in Washington for their representatives?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes. The British Government owns its own residence, and France has bought land on which it expects to build. The Chinese have erected an embassy, and Germany, unless I am wrong, owns its own embassy. Not only do many of the great powers do this, but the powers of smaller importance.

Mr. STERLING. Are they any more imposing or impressive than the residences our representatives occupy in foreign capitals?

Mr. PERKINS. That depends on the representative. If you compare them with the representative that we now have in London, they are very much less imposing; but if you compare them with some of the places I have seen where our representatives reside, particularly when they were living in a pension, they are very much more imposing.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, for my information, and, I think, perhaps, for the information of others, I would like to ask the gentleman if he can give us some information as to the amount of allowances that he says are made by foreign countries to their representatives.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, I do not know; it varies.

Mr. NORRIS. And while I am asking the question, you can answer both at once. How do the salaries allowed by foreign countries compare with those allowed by our country?

Mr. PERKINS. The salaries and allowances go together; they are very much larger. To the representatives of most of the great powers, first, the salary is larger to start with; the house is furnished, of course, free of rent, and then an allowance is made for furnishing, and, I think, an allowance is made for a certain amount of diplomatic receptions, for a certain amount of social display. Great Britain allows her representative here $48,000 in all; in Paris, $44,000. France allows $36,000 here, and $38,000 in London. Germany allows $36,000 in London, and Austria $28,000. In addition to this residences are furnished.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this subject has been suggested, I think, to all of us by a somewhat curious and a somewhat unfortunate incident which recently occurred. As we all know it was suggested, and there was foundation for the suggestion, that Doctor Hill, who had been selected as the representative of our Government to Berlin, was possibly persona non grata at that capital. No one suggested, Mr. Chairman, anything against Doctor Hill's ability. No question could be raised. He was, of course, exceptionally fitted for that service, and for any diplomatic position, alike from long experience and large ability. No one suggested that he had ever said or done anything which would be distasteful to the Government to which he was accredited. The suggestion that came from Berlin through devious courses had undoubtedly a social foundation. No one desired in any way, nor is there any reason why anyone should criticise the present representative of our Government there, but the fact exists that he is a man of very great wealth—I make no criticism of it—and that he has been extending a very profuse hospitality, which doubtless has been gratifying to those who have been fortunate enough to share therein.

One result of our somewhat unfortunate system of not only paying low salaries, but further refusing to assist the minister by furnishing him at least with a residence, is that positions of this sort, being out of the power of a poor man or a man of moderate means, have naturally come into the hands not only of the rich, but of the very rich. A position which a man of moderate means can not fill naturally becomes a position that falls to a man of very large wealth as a thing that is held apart for those of his class, and as a result the feeling, to some extent, has grown up abroad, not only in Berlin but elsewhere, that the American ambassador is naturally a person who has very great possessions in this world's goods and can extend a profuse, extensive, and splendid hospitality. Now, hospitality has its uses, Mr. Chairman. Dining and wining are not without value in diplomatic life or any other life, but after all, if it has come to be the chief recognized function of American ambassadors, that they must be persons who shall be fitted to entertain on a scale of the greatest splendor, then surely the time for American ambassadors as an American institution has gone by. [Applause.]

I think the possibility of a recurrence of just such an incident as occurred at Berlin would be very much lessened if our Government did as I suggest—provide residences for its representatives, not so splendid that they can only be lived in by multimillionaires, but sufficient so they will assist to reduce tho expenses of any fit person who may be sent to fill those positions. Thus the possibility of such incidents, and the danger of our diplomatic positions falling entirely and exclusively into the hands of those who shall attract the attention of foreign capitals chiefly by the extraordinary magnificence of their life, will certainly diminish. It is evident that abroad, as well as at home, the merits of plain living and high thinking are not appreciated in all cases, and whatever can be done by our own Government and by the proper action of Congress to bring about in our diplomatic service a mode of living by which shall be avoid alike the extremes of squalor and the extremes of undue splendor will, I am sure, meet the approval of this House and the public at large. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARRETT. Does not the condition now prevailing have a tendency to cause the people of any nations to whom an ambassador or minister is accredited by the United States to believe that the greatest emphasis is to be laid upon the wealth of the ambassador?

Mr. PERKINS. I think that is so to some extent.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman has time to permit me to insert this statement——

Mr. PERKINS. I have the time if the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. GARRETT. A gentleman said to me not long ago that he was dining as a guest of the American ambassador to Great Britain a year or two ago, and during the course of the dinner an English editor, who was sitting by him, turned to him and said:

It must be very gratifying to Americans to know they have an ambassador able to rent the best house that is for rent in London.

That must have meant that this Englishman thought that is the only thing that Americans might be proud of—that is, the wealth of the ambassador. This is the result of conditions against which my friend [Mr. PERKINS] is complaining, and with whom, in this, I agree.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a word more about another proposition in connection with a bill which is before the House, and which we hope to bring to its attention, and that is the proposition to purchase proper buildings for consulates in China, Japan, and Korea.

There is, Mr. Chairman, a special necessity there, because in the extreme East it is difficult at any price to obtain proper residences for people from the West. In the Chinese cities there are certain portions set aside for the foreign population. They are small, and experience shows that it is often difficult to obtain in them any place proper for the residence of the consul or the minister and for the business of the American consulate. It is specially unfortunate, Mr. Chairman, because in the East more than in the West, in China very much more than in Europe, the surroundings, the residences, the modes of life of our representatives are not only of social but of actual commercial importance.

The people of the East, more than ourselves, pay much attention to the outside of the platter. It is difficult for the oriental mind to believe where it sees a representative of one government housed in a magnificent residence, surrounded by all that may appeal to the eye, and on some other street, in a tumbledown house, in a second-class part of the town, the residence and the official home of the representative of this country, that those two nations can be of equal importance. And this has an effect upon oriental trade to an extent that we in the West perhaps do not fully understand.

Now I will show to the gentlemen that are kind enough to listen to my speech these pictures. [Exhibiting pictures.] There is an object lesson. There are two buildings taken on the same scale. They are two photographs taken in the city of Shanghai, one of the great centers of eastern trade. This building [indicating] represents the place which every Chinaman and every Chinese merchant as he walks by knows is the home and the official residence of the consul of the German Empire, and the German Empire is pushing its trade in the East in a way which we can not disregard.

It is a rival, becoming constantly more dangerous, for the possession of the great Eastern market, and so far as the oriental mind is affected by its residence in Shanghai, there is the home of Germany, and there is the home of the country that we call the greatest commercial nation in the world. You may think that has no influence. We may think, Mr. Chairman, that that has no influence upon the oriental mind; that when he sees on the one side——

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give an estimate as to the respective cost of those two quarters?

Mr. PERKINS. Germany, England, and, I think, France, in Shanghai own their own buildings.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give an idea of the cost of the quarters he has shown to the committee?

Mr. PERKINS. Owned by Germany?

Mr. STAFFORD. The cost of the consulate you have just shown, so that the committee, and the country also, can gain some idea as to the respective quarters in which the two representatives are domiciled.

Mr. PERKINS. I will answer the gentleman by saying that in eleven Chinese cities, and five cities in Japan and Korea, including a building in Shanghai which shall be large enough not only to provide a residence for the consul, but also a home for the Chinese court, including proper buildings, fit and sufficient buildings, in all these other places, the entire expense would be less than it costs to build one-seventh of a battle ship. Now, which is the more useful to American trade, to American enterprise, to the development of American commerce, is for us to consider. In other words, about $1,200,000 would furnish all the buildings that are asked for in the Orient.

Mr. STAFFORD. My inquiry is not directed as to the expediency of this, but as to whether the gentleman could give some more definite information, so it would appear in the RECORD, as to the cost of the building, the picture of which he showed us, wherein the German consulate was quartered, and that in which the American consulate was quartered—the relative cost?

Mr. PERKINS. I imagine that the cost of the building of the German consulate probably is from $300,000 to $400,000. Our building is rented. [Indicating.] I do not know what that costs, but a very small sum.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The Government has just bought in Constantinople a residence for our ambassador at a cost of $150,000, including the furniture, which is a credit to our American nation.

Mr. PERKINS. It is; yes, sir. At a time when we are considering the problem of the extension of our trade in the East, we should make proper, but not excessive or extravagant, appropriations, which shall put our Government—the American merchants who need the assistance of our Government—on the same footing with the other great commercial nations of Europe. This is certainly greatly demanded, and I do sincerely hope, even before this Congress adjourns, that some proper appropriation will have been made, alike for the dignity of our country in Europe and for the extension of our trade in Asia. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit a further question anent the query propounded by the gentleman from Connecticut? Will he state to the committee the number of Government buildings that we have erected for the use of ambassadors, similar to that we have erected in Constantinople, or whether that is the exceptional and only instance?

Mr. PERKINS. The Government owns legation premises at Peking, China; Tokyo, Japan; Constantinople, Turkey; Tangier, Morocco, and Bangkok, Siam.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman state the exceptional reasons, if any, why the Government has erected quarters for our diplomatic representatives in those places?

Mr. PERKINS. The reasons are that in those cities it is practically impossible to rent any residence that is fit for our Western modes of life.

Mr. STAFFORD. The same reason that you advance for advocating that our Government establish consular quarters in the East?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes. When it comes to Europe, of course consular quarters fit and proper can be obtained there. It is a mere question of renting them. The question of owning embassies in Europe is of course a different question and presents different suggestions.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I feel that I ought to apologize to the House for the crudity of the remarks I am going to submit. I did not know until yesterday afternoon that this bill would be taken up to-day, or I should have taken more time and given more adequate preparation to a subject which I consider of unusual importance. I have, however, thrown together hastily a few observations on two questions, that of suitable premises for the residence of our diplomatic agents abroad and that of the development of trade particularly in South and Central America and in the Orient. I treat them as allied subjects.

After having devoted ourselves for several days to the work of strengthening one of the great military arms of the Government, it is pleasant to turn to the less expensive and more exalted duty of equipping that branch of our political establishment that is dedicated to the task of keeping the peace and of promoting good will among men.

AIMS OF DIPLOMACY.

Our ambassadors and diplomatic agents of all rank are ministers of peace. While they are at their stations there is at least and always an outward show of friendship. When the breach comes they depart. When peace is reestablished they return. They go abroad to protect the honor and the interests of their country, and the most important duty with which they are charged is to maintain honorable peace. After it is broken they are devoted to the noble work of reestablishing it and to the negotiation of new treaties of friendship and commerce.

Some of the greatest men in the history of our country have represented us in that capacity. There was, at the very beginning of our history, the wise old printer and philosopher, Dr. Benjamin Franklin; John Adams, a sterling patriot and learned egotist, who became the second President; Thomas Jefferson, who is with the immortals; Livingston, Monroe, and others, whose names would add luster to the roll if I could take the time to call them. They were untrained in the arts of diplomacy, but they dealt successfully with great and perplexing problems in real crises. Later they were followed by other great Americans, who upheld the dignity of democracy at the most aristocratic courts of Europe. I do not care what a man's politics may be, he must be proud of the fact that the Adamses, Buchanan, Motley, Lowell, Bayard, Phelps, and Andrew D. White were his countrymen.

The work that these great men did was of such a nature that it did not come under the immediate observation of the people. It has not been properly appreciated by the masses simply because it has been perfectly understood only by students of international politics.

We owe something to the memory of these illustrious and useful men. We owe something to the corps in which they served with distinction, and we ought to pay the debt without further delay.

Mr. Chairman, we ought to get rid of the idea that a diplomatic station is a pleasant asylum for politicians who have lost out at home, or a recompense to men of wealth who have contributed to campaign funds. As one citizen of the country who has traveled somewhat and observed a few things, I will take this occasion to say that the selections for exalted diplomatic stations have not, apparently, always been made with the idea that the American representative should be a man of good manners or pleasant address. One or two unfortunate experiences have convinced me that the obscure American will avoid the embassies if he is wise.

HOMES FOR AMBASSADORS.

I am advised, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs will probably recommend to this House that the Government shall provide suitable residences for our diplomatic representatives in foreign countries. If such a measure is submitted, I sincerely hope that it may be adopted. Contrasted with the accommodations supplied by foreign governments to their representatives, the embassies of the United States are either ludicrously inadequate or, if the diplomat happens to be a man of large wealth, almost grotesque in their extravagance. American representatives of equal rank may live over a shop or occupy a palace.

This inequality can only be corrected by Congress. The work of providing suitable embassies for our diplomatic agents in foreign countries should have been undertaken long ago, and it ought to have been persisted in until every ambassador and minister had been housed with comfort and dignity. Each Government of importance in the whole world—and some of very little importance, also—has its representative at the seat of other governments. We have them all the way from Petersburg of the White Czar to Monrovia in the fantastic black Republic, and no one has suggested that we should discontinue a practice that is universal.

Now, if it is worth while having these representatives at all it is worth while to maintain them in a manner that is in harmony wth the dignity and importance of the country. If we do not do this, we will be virtually saying to the world that the great North American Republic, despite its declaration of equality, has set aside certain of its more important offices for the exclusive enjoyment of the rich by making it impossible for the citizen of small means to occupy them.

I have often thought that, in view of what is expected of them, the two classes of American officials who are the most inadequately paid are Cabinet officers and foreign ministers.

Both unavoidably incur great social obligations. The Cabinet officer may avoid a part of these obligations without impairing his usefulness, but the foreign minister can not do so and maintain his mission at the highest state of efficiency. As a consequence of these conditions the tendency is more and more to select men of large wealth for such places. It is wrong, and it is decidedly un-American.

I do not believe that a citizen is disqualified for office because he has made or inherited riches, and I certainly do not think that the possession of a fortune qualifies him for public service, and, above all, I abhor the thought that certain places of right belong to the man of wealth just because he is so fortunate as to be above the necessity of earning a living.

Under difficulties, we are led to infer, a rich man may enter the kingdom of heaven, and he may be as accomplished in statecraft as Motley, Lowell, or Bayard, but these really great men should not have their memories insulted by mention in the same breath with another class who are only distinguished because they give costly dinners or pay extravagant rent for the palaces they occupy while socially exploiting themselves as American officials.

Two great Governments have just been jolted by the mere replacing of one representative by another. It was rumored, I hope without foundation, that the substitution of a highly trained diplomat of exalted character, but of limited means, for another who may be equally qualified and who is a man of great wealth, did not meet the approval of the sovereign to whose court he was to be sent, just because he was classed as a poor man. The rumors were denied from the court of that sovereign, and our diplomat, it now appears, is persona grata and will be received.

But the very fact that such stories could be circulated, Mr. Chairman, shows the state of mind of the public. Out of it all comes a great degree of embarrassment that I hope will help us to establish a standard for American ambassadors.

Let us give the American representatives a decent and dignified residence, with a fair salary, and then make up in character and qualifications for any lack of individual wealth. We are behind nearly all the other important governments in the world in this respect. We own embassies in China, Japan, Siam, Turkey, and Morocco, and here and there in oriental countries we also own certain unimportant consulates.

I have never investigated the matter, but I dare say that the reason we have buildings in those countries is that an American could not find a house for rent that he could or would occupy with his family.

In all of Europe and in the twenty or more American governments we do not own a single building. If our ambassador to any of these European countries happens to be a man of wealth who has taken the place for the social prestige it confers, he can command a house that will be suited to his purposes; but if, on the other hand, he should be a man whose wealth is measured by his salary, he will find it quite impossible to find a residence that the diplomatic representative of the United States should occupy.

In South and Central America, I am told, and in Mexico, I know, it is almost impossible for the American ambassador or minister to get a proper house; yet no provision is made for them, as has been done in China, Japan, and Morocco. I protest against this discrimination. We ought at least to reciprocate the courtesy of those countries that have acquired buildings in Washington. England, Germany, China, Japan, and Mexico own buildings here. The French Republic is to build, I am told.

The money that American ambassadorial residences in foreign capitals will cost will not be thrown away. I am convinced that it will prove to be a profitable investment. Because I appreciate its political and commercial importance I am particularly anxious to see the United States own an embassy at the seat of each independent government in the Western Hemisphere. It is a courtesy that the people of the American governments will appreciate.

Last summer I had the honor of an interview with the President of Mexico, one of the really great men in public life in any country, and with him I discussed this question. In the last twenty-five years Mexico has grown marvelously, and General Diaz has grown with it. His history for that period is largely the history of his country. The development of Mexico has been the development of Porfirio Diaz. Beyond the boundaries of his own country his chief interest seems to be in watching the development of the United States of the north, as Mexicans refer to us, and in securing to his country and to ours the benefit of friendly intercourse and commercial exchange. We do nothing of importance in the Congress of the United States to-day that is not a part of the knowledge of President Diaz to-morrow.

In my interview with him he referred to my effort of a year ago to get an embassy building in Mexico. He was surprised that I had not been successful. His great mind refused to comprehend the point of order that was my undoing. I told him that we would try again this year and that I hoped for success. He smilingly reminded me of the fact that property in Mexico was rapidly advancing in value.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that we should build such a palace in Mexico that the man of merely average means would rattle around in it. But we ought to have a handsome, dignified, commodious house that would accommodate the ambassador and his family and the offices of the embassy.

The present ambassador to Mexico, in reply to an inquiry of the Secretary of State, recommended an appropriation of $300,000 for the purchase of ground and the erection and furnishing of a building. In my judgment it is at least 50 per cent more than will be required. Two hundred thousand will certainly be all that is necessary, and very likely $150,000 will be enough.

AMERICAN AND ORIENTAL TRADE.

We are appropriating a considerable sum this year for consulates and court buildings in the Orient, and so far nothing has been recommended for the American countries.

I shall invite your attention to a brief analysis of the trade of the Orient in comparison with that of Central and South America, both actual and potential. The remarkable journey made by the Secretary of State, Mr. Root, was a recognition of the vast and growing importance in commerce and politics of the South American countries. No better missioner could have been sent afield. A broadly intellectual man, with large training in great business affairs and a protracted experience in high and responsible public office, he was quick to comprehend the people of the American Republics and the possibilities of their development. It will amply reward any member of this body to read his addresses, and with maps and statistics follow him through that great tour.

The average citizen of our country no more understands the facts about South America than he does the language of those countries. It is news to most of them to learn that Brazil is as large as the United States and will then have a remnant of territory as big as California and South Carolina left over. The Argentine Republic is as large as all the United States east of the Mississippi and with Texas added. Mexico, with which we are more familiar, is equal in area to nearly all the States east of the Mississippi River. It is nearly three times as big as Texas.

I wish I had time, Mr. Chairman, to give a lot of these interesting facts about South and Central American countries, or I wish I had the power to compel every man who has the right to vote on these appropriation bills to read the data that I shall insert in the RECORD. Better still, if Members will only avail themselves of the facilities offered by the International Bureau of American Republics, they have open to them sources of information that will delight and instruct them. That useful Bureau is actually introducing the citizens of the North American Republic to their neighbors in the south.

In Latin America are twenty governments that have a population of about 50,000,000 people who do a total annual business of nearly $2,000,000,000. They import $897,128,563; they export $1,070,660,724; making a total of $1,967,789,287, to be exact.

What particularly interests us is to know what share of that vast trade we control in the United States and how to increase it. Our merchants sell to Latin America $237,840,679 worth of stuff each year and buy to the value of $316,496,576, a total trade with the United States of $554,337,255. How many of our people know that we do a business of more than half a billion dollars each year with Mexico, Central and South America, and the West Indies? For that matter, how many Members of Congress know it? Mr. Barrett, the head of the International Bureau of American Republics, in an article that appeared in Munsey's Magazine last June, called attention to the fact that the total foreign trade, exports and imports, of the ten South American Republics for the year of 1905, plus that of the British, French, and Dutch Guianas, exceeded $1,200,000,000. He directed attention to the deplorable fact that notwithstanding our favorable geographical situation, the United States had less than $250,000,000 worth of that trade. Then this magnificent business is not at a standstill. It has not reached its full growth. In fact, it is just beginning to grow. All that vast area to the south of the United States, so many times larger than our own country, has a population of only about 50,000,000. It covers nearly all habitable latitudes. It extends nearly as far to the south of the equator as we do to the north of it. Everything that the soil yields that man requires can be produced somewhere in Central or South America or Mexico. It is a land of magnificent possibilities near home that we overlook for things of smaller value farther away.

Let me invite your attention to a few of the interesting facts disclosed by a study of the commercial and financial statistics of the principal countries of the world.

The people of the Argentine Republic import $34.86 worth of foreign merchandise for each person in that country. The people of China import 78 cents' worth of stuff per head. In other words, each citizen of Argentina is worth forty-five times as much as a Chinaman as a customer. Brazilians are worth twelve times as much, and Mexicans ten times as much, measured by imports. Little Uruguay, which is larger than New York and West Virginia, by the way, imports for each man, woman, and child in the country to the extent of $21.13, or more than twenty-seven times as much as China.

Now, I am going to ask your attention for a few minutes while I make a brief comparison of two or three of these neglected South American countries with one in the Orient that is much in the public eye.

The Argentine, as I have already stated, consumes foreign imports to the value of $34.86 per head. Japan imports to the value of $5.07 per head. It is perfectly plain that in the present development of trade each citizen of Argentina is worth, approximately, seven times as much as a Japanese. The people of far-away New Zealand are worth nearly fourteen times as much per head as customers as are the people of Japan, but they are not so much in the lime light, and we almost forget them. Down in Central America one citizen of Costa Rica buys as much foreign-made stuff as three Japanese, and the latter are of less value to our exporters, man for man, than the inhabitants of Ecuador and Paraguay, two countries of minor importance in the south.

While I am on this subject I will also call attention to the fact that even with a vast amount of stores brought into the Philippines for the American army, the inhabitants of that archipelago only take imports to the value of $3.38 per head. They are surpassed in commercial importance by the inhabitants of Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Salvador, Cuba, Ecuador, Haiti even, Mexico, Paraguay, Peru, Santo Domingo, Uruguay, and Venezuela as to their value per head as customers.

I am firmly impressed with the idea, Mr. Chairman, that if we were to quit squandering such vast sums on the less important trade of the Far East and devote a tithe of it to the cultivation of business with other American countries, we would be doing a wiser thing.

THE LAND OF TO-MORROW.

Mr. Barrett, in his article to which I have referred, very felicitously speaks of South and Central America as the "Land of to-morrow." Now, that can not be said of the East Indies, of China, or even of Japan. At best they are "the lands of the day after to-morrow." All the American countries have vast unoccupied areas of fertile soil. The Orient is already crowded to suffocation.

The marvelously rapid development of our own country, the high standard of wages, and the prosperity and independence of the people of the United States, have been very clearly due to the fact that we had an undeveloped continent overflowing with opportunity. The fertility of the soil, the wealth of the mines and of the forest, and the small population when contrasted with resources, have kept our people from industrial slavery. Although opportunities are lessening with the increase of population we still have such outlets for their energies and talents that no American workman need yet apprehend the hard conditions of overpopulated Europe, or the intolerable condition of congested China or Japan.

In Japan, China, and the East Indies men work for a few cents a day because they can do no better. In South America they do not have to, because they can go to the land and be independent. There is no emigration to the countries of the Orient. The people of Europe who emigrate will not go to a country like Japan, where 2½ acres is the average size of a farm. They prefer America, in the North or the South, and they are going in increasing numbers to the South. There they find conditions that would look like paradise to an Oriental.

Because I do not want to see my own country settled too rapidly, as I have sometimes feared it was doing, I have rejoiced to see the tide of European emigration turning toward South America. It means comfort for the industrially oppressed of Europe, and it means a tremendous expansion of trade possibilities in neighboring countries for the business men of the United States. Let us show our appreciation of it and go after it.

If our characteristic American energy is exercised in the development of the possibilities in South and Central America, there is scarcely any limit to the volume of business that may be done between countries on the same continent and ourselves, having the same political institutions, and aspiring along the same lines, political, social, and commercial. [Loud applause.]

[a] The figures given above for commerce with the United States are taken from reports of the United States Bureau of Statistics and do not in all cases agree with the reports issued by the several countries. For example, the Bolivian consuls at New York and San Francisco report for the year 1907 shipments to Bolivia amounting to $2,852,460.30. The discrepancy in this case possibly arises through crediting exports from the United States intended for Bolivia, but which pass in transit through ports of Peru, Chile, or Brazil to the latter countries instead of to Bolivia. The Bolivian consuls secure their data from consular invoices which show final destination.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for forty-eight minutes.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, it is now generally admitted that the time has come when the tariff is to be revised, and with two objects in view: First, to secure a readjustment of protective duties at home; and second, to aid in developing and extending our trade abroad.

It would be a sad comment upon the legislative wisdom of this Congress if concurrently with such action we should, by adopting a new monetary system with a currency bearing a higher tax than that of any other nation on earth, thereby not only force down the wages of labor at home and at the same time prevent all possibility of competing with our commercial rivals abroad, but which, whatever the intent of its advocates, would inevitably result in preventing the inflow of gold and probably be the direct cause of the expulsion of much of that which we now have.

For fifteen years, since the repeal of the silver-purchase clause of the Sherman Act, which was the preliminary step toward the theoretical adoption of the single gold standard in 1900, a reform and reconstruction of our banking system and the necessity for adapting it to the fluctuating and growing needs of this great country have annually been dinned into the ears of our national legislators, and precisely what happened last fall, namely, a practical breakdown of the system, has been prophesied.

For that result the men who have steadily opposed any change must accept the responsibility. During these years, with a constantly decreasing supply of Government bonds and a constantly increasing demand for banking facilities, the number of national banks has doubled and the volume of bank notes, for which the burden of current redemption is thrown upon the Treasury, has increased by nearly $500,000,000, or 250 per cent.

Now, with a circulation per capita of $35.35, relatively and actually larger than that of any other country, and larger than ever before in our own history, and ignoring the fact that the recent panic was the natural result of a world-wide overextension of credit, it is seriously proposed to provide relief for the future by making it possible to pile debt upon debt, and without any provision for a gold reserve and in defiance of every principle of sound finance, by expressly stipulating that one bank note may be paid by another, to inject into the circulation five hundred millions more of notes for the payment of which, in gold or its equivalent, the Treasury of the United States is made responsible, while the banks which issue them are relieved from that burden.

AS OTHERS SEE US.

It is sometimes well to see ourselves as others see us. At a recent meeting (February 4) of the London City and Midland Bank, the managing director, Mr. E. H. Holden, referred to the United States as follows:

The pressure of trade on the money markets of the world continued in increased measure during the year 1907 and occasioned a great struggle for gold, which was fiercest in America and Germany, these two countries requiring more gold in order to protect the excessive amount of credits created during recent years. The creation of credit has been growing in America during the last ten years, and the climax was reached last year, when the breakdown, which had been predicted for some time, took place, a breakdown which was sure to come, because bankers there so persistently ignored the first principle of banking—that credit should not be increased unless at the same time it be accompanied by an adequate increase of gold for its protection.

Later in the same address, in considering the question whether the world has not already entered on a period of contraction of trade and of lower money rates, he made this significant remark:

A fall in prices means less credits and a consequent smaller demand for gold. A smaller demand for gold, coupled with a constantly increased supply of that metal from South Africa and elsewhere, should bring about lower rates for money, and this will probably take place unless overruled by the course of legislation in America. If the effect of that legislation be to largely increase the currency on the basis of securities, either Government or otherwise, without any relation to gold, then we may again have an outburst of speculation which may not only prevent prices from falling, but may increase them and thus bring about a worse condition of affairs than that which we have recently witnessed.

Every pending proposition ignores this except the Fowler bill. [Applause.]

In view of that last sentence, which, in my judgment, is as sound in principle as the Ten Commandments, and considering the action of the United States Senate in passing the Aldrich bill, is it any wonder that one of the great London papers a short time ago characterized the United States as an "international financial nuisance?" [Laughter.]

THE PANIC CONDITIONS, WORLD-WIDE.

I have said that the conditions of last fall were world-wide, and not, as many people here seem to think, a purely local disturbance.

Let me quote from the London Times Financial Review of the year 1907:

While some agricultural countries, such as Argentina, have been favored by excellent crops and get the benefit of high prices, the industrial depression which has set in is practically world-wide. The United States have had general business depression on the top of a financial débacle, and are thus worse off than, say, Germany and the United Kingdom, which, to the beginnings of industrial decline, have added only monetary stringency. But though the condition of the great industrial countries differs in degree, it is the same in essence; the change from trade expansion to trade depression has come, and we are beginning to experience the comparatively lean years which always follow the immoderately fat ones.

Again, referring to the forced advance in the English bank rate to 7 per cent, it says (what some of us may well ponder over):

From that time onward the outlook in the United States became steadily blacker, and it was not improved by the frantic attempts made on behalf of the numerous class of persons of various degrees of importance who had overspeculated to prove that the whole situation had arisen because President Roosevelt was determined to enforce the law against misuse of trust funds and certain clases of "deals" which were becoming a public danger, and said so in disagreeably plain language. The crisis has shown once more the weakness of the American systems of banking and currency.

Referring to the iron industry, it says:

The year which began in hope and confidence ended in distrust and depression. And the distrust was felt and was working its depressing effect before the financial crisis in America. The world's appetite for iron and steel seems to have been suddenly satiated.

The peculiarity of the year was the abruptness and completeness with which forward buying ceased, as confidence disappeared before the apparent dread of some great calamity about to occur. In point of fact, what was dreaded was not the monetary scarcity in America which has upset international finance, but the results of the termination of the industrial "booms" in America and Germany.

The situation in Canada is described as follows:

A change, however, came over the scene as the second half of the year began. Money, the rates upon which, owing to the past years of rapid expansion, had been showing a gradual tendency to stiffen, became exceptionally scarce. Bankers began to see in the situation many elements of danger, and a policy of retrenchment was introduced. The country had been spending more than it was earning apparently; and had the bankers not exercised the pruning knife industriously and skillfully, there is little doubt that ere this a condition of affairs fully as bad as that which was seen in the United States would have prevailed in Canada.

Even far-off South Africa has not been exempt. I quote:

Every branch of productive industry except farming and mining has been virtually stagnant, and in spite of the steady efflux of artisans, clerks, and shop assistants throughout the greater part of the year each of the chief centers of population has had a considerable army of unemployed. Retrenchment and the cutting down of salaries have been the universal rule. But the exodus and the diminished spending power of those who remain do not serve fully to explain the abnormal conditions which have obtained and still continue. The primary causes of the state of demoralization lie deeper. The great commercial centers are still paying the penalty of overtrading and excessive speculation.

Reviewing our own condition, it says:

THE PANIC OF OCTOBER.

The month of October will always be memorable for the financial catastrophe that overwhelmed the country, bringing about the suspension of numerous financial institutions, causing runs on many banks and trust companies, and compelling the associated banks in New York and banks in other cities to resort to the issue of clearing-house certificates. Some of the causes of that panic had their origin long before, and included overspeculation, extravagance, a congestion of securities, exhaustion of floating capital, undue stirring up of the mistaken prejudice against wealth, and an overstraining of credit generally. The more immediate causes are too familiar to require extended mention.

With reference to conditions in Germany, I quote from the Frankfurter Zeitung of February 10:

Though things up to the present have not culminated in an actual crisis or a general smash, yet there is universal stagnation. There are no transactions on the Bourse, its functions are atrophied in an unparalleled fashion, its foreign business and even its home issues are almost at a standstill, and the possessors of every kind of security are brooding over heavy losses. In industry the interests of buyers and sellers are opposed, in the great branches of trade demand is forcibly contracted, and no one will buy; there is a cessation of new orders. Certainly we have good reason, looking back at the year's end, to review its course and gain light by which to realize the present and to gain a glimpse of the future.

Reviewing France, the Times says:

Of all the large financial centers Paris remains the best supplied with available funds and will be doubtless looked to whenever an application for fresh capital is made.

Of Egypt—

The rapid rate of Egypt's commercial expansion has been temporarily checked by the financial crisis of 1907, which for the past nine months has had a depressing influence on most of the branches of her import trade and minor industries. It is easy to be wise after the event, and most of those people who have hitherto fought shy of this market will be disposed to give Egypt a bad mark for her latest act of folly, but they would do well to reserve criticism until they have become acquainted with some of the causes which led up to the climax, when the banks insisted on the prompt settlement of all overdrawn accounts and refused to advance money any longer on imported merchandise or other security.

And so I might continue, but in the whole review of the world's condition I find but one spot where the year ended better than at its beginning, and that is in Argentina:

GOOD CROPS AND LAND DEVELOPMENT.

BUENOS AYRES, December 4.

The year which is about to close has been, in spite of various adverse circumstances, one of progress and prosperity for the Republic.

And yet in none of them was there a practical suspension of the banks as there was here in our reserve centers, where hundreds of Government checks were refused payment and millions of dollars of bank balances were settled by clearing-house certificates of indebtedness.

Is it not a good time for us to stop and think whether we may not be mistaken as to the perfection of our own banking system and to profit by the experience of the rest of the world?

THE ALDRICH BILL.

In lieu of that the Aldrich bill is offered, and the alternative given as that or nothing. For one I say, better, infinitely better have nothing, for in my honest judgment the enactment of this bill into law will only make conditions worse. [Applause.]

What is its purpose? There need not be the slightest doubt in regard to it, for on page 17 of the published speech of the Senator from Rhode Island he says:

There should be no misunderstanding as to the sole controlling purpose of this bill; it proposes by its provisions to prevent panics and furnish the means of relieving panic conditions.

And on page 2833 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD he says, in opening the debate on this bill:

I made the statement that it must be apparent to everybody that there is no demand at this moment for emergency circulation.

And further on he added:

It is not a question whether or not there is an additional currency issue demanded now, but the point is that when the emergency arises, whether it shall be to-morrow, or next day, or next week, or next year, or ten years from now (I hope it will be deferred ten years, or twenty, or thirty), we should be prepared for it. That it is the paramount duty of Congress to furnish the necessary machinery which will be effective when the demand arises.

Mr. Chairman, in a certain city in Connecticut is a drawbridge where a terrible accident once happened and a train plunged into the river, resulting in a great loss of life. To prevent a repetition of such an accident, a switch has been placed a short distance from the bridge, so that when the draw is open the train will be thrown from the track. The invention is called a "derailer," and while it may prevent the train plunging into the open draw it offers the alternative of death and destruction to the passengers on land.

What this country needs to-day is a banking system with which to "do business," and not simply emergency propositions to prevent disaster or relieve its victims.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman state briefly the difference between the Aldrich bill and the Vreeland bill?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would if I had time. It is the addition of an unfortunate complication to an already complicated condition. [Laughter and applause.]

As I have read the provisions of the Aldrich bill and studied them with reference to the trade necessities and requirements of the country, I have been forcibly reminded of the press notices which have become so common nowadays concerning the surgical operations of many distinguished physicians, that "the operation was a success, but the patient failed to rally and died." [Laughter and applause.]

Suppose that the Aldrich bill had been upon the statute books prior to October, 1907. What would have been its effect? Referring to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, I find on page 13 the following:

In the early part of April an unusual stringency in the money market was relieved by the temporary increase of public deposits with depositary banks to facilitate the importation of gold. In the import movement thus sustained more than $49,000,000 in gold was added to the general stock of that metal in the country.

Does anyone suppose for a moment that there is any conceivable way by which the issuance of the emergency circulation provided for in the Aldrich bill would have resulted in such an importation of gold?

During the first quarter of 1907—

additional temporary deposits of public moneys were made in depositary banks to enable them to import gold, which by October 15 resulted in an addition of $34,119,000 to the stock of that metal. At two other times during that year the Treasury was compelled to come to the relief of the money market, and the addition to our stock of gold during the year was over $118,000,000.

This was reserve money and was a basis for the expansion of our credit to at least $500,000,000.

Is anyone so blind that he can not see that during that year the Aldrich bill would have been put in operation, with the result that the gold would not have come to us, and that the issue of an equivalent amount of nonreserve money based purely upon the existing debts would have resulted in expelling from the country a very considerable amount of gold which was already here? [Applause.]

Indeed, the Secretary says concerning 1902—I quote from page 43 of his report:

Financiers generally now recognize, and some of the best known have publicly announced that but for what was then done a panic would have ensued rivaling in severity any in our history, and which would possibly have continued until industrial conditions were disastrously affected.

In 1903 the trouble was met again by a deposit of Government funds and the purchase of Government bonds. The Secretary adds:

The national-bank circulation was also stimulated to some extent.

In 1905 he says:

The anticipated stringency was deferred by extensive refundings of Government bonds into consols of 1930, which, in conjunction with withdrawals of deposits, lowered the price of consols to a point where banks found the maintenance of circulation profitable, and an increase of $25,000,000 resulted.

He adds:

The crisis inevitable came, though some months delayed.

In 1906, speaking of the crop-moving period, he says:

Everything seems serene to everybody except to those who recognize that in this latitude crops mature in the fall.

And, finally, on page 49, he says:

These cases have been thus reviewed, not for the purpose of expressing an opinion as to the wisdom or want of wisdom exercised by this Department, but solely as the basis of an argument in favor of some Congressional legislation on the subject of a more elastic currency.

I have thus briefly reviewed the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and the conditions of the past five years, to show that what is needed now is not temporary, emergency legislation to meet a panic once in ten, or twenty, or thirty years, but legislation which will permit the growing industries of the United States to naturally expand, and that if we do not have such legislation the country must necessarily avail itself at each recurring crop period, and at each time of excessive stock speculation, of the expensive and cumbersome methods which are covered by the provisions of this bill.

A PIECE OF PATCHWORK.

On page 35 of the speech to which I have referred the Senator says:

While our existing currency system may perhaps be fairly characterized as a piece of patchwork, composed of elements which seem perhaps diverse and inharmonious, as a whole it has answered well the purposes of this great nation, and none of its elements are dangerous in character.

So far as the patchwork description is concerned, I fully agree with him, but I call the attention of our people to a higher authority than that of the distinguished author of this bill, which will be found in the ninth chapter of Matthew, sixteenth verse, and which reads as follows:

No man putteth a piece of new cloth into an old garment, for that which is put in to fill it up taketh from the garment and the rent is made worse.

And this is precisely what this patch of the Aldrich bill will do to our banking system, for if the purpose of this bill is carried out it will take $550,000,000 from the commercial funds of the country and lock it up in unliquid securities—securities as a rule not listed on any stock exchange and controlled largely by individual dealers in both the purchase and the sale of them. Indeed, on page 23 of the Senator's speech, he says:

The Congress, in my judgment, might properly, in the wise exercise of its supervisory control over the investments of national banks, require these institutions to invest a portion of their assets in this class of securities, and this without reference to their use as security for possible note issues or United States deposits. This requirement would be in the interest alike of the public and of stockholders.

And on page 24 he adds:

If all the national banks of the country should hold the entire amount of bonds that would be acceptable for security for note issues to the amount of $500,000,000, it would mean the investment of little more than 6 per cent of the total resources of such banks in this class of securities.

The whole tenor of the bill shows this to be its purpose, so that so far from furnishing relief by supplying additional loanable funds for the carrying on of our industries and commerce, it literally "taketh from the garment, and the rent is made worse."

It is true that for this expenditure of loanable capital there could be received in return 90 per cent in bank notes, which would not, however, be available as reserve money, but the investment would be at a probable loss of from 2 to 6 per cent when no emergency was existing, a loss varying according to the prevailing rates of discounts in different parts of the country, and a loss which is certain to be incurred by all banks, except possibly in the reserve cities and in the low-rate call-money markets of the country, where speculative banking institutions might take the dangerous chance of investing the reserves of country banks and availing themselves of the provisions of this bill by satisfying in times of stress their depositors with this emergency circulation.

It should be noted, however, that no more ingenious method can be devised of retaining these deposits at such a time than is found in the provisions of this bill, for when these payments were made in this nonreserve money the country banks which would receive it would find their reserves decreased by precisely the amount which they drew from the reserve banks, for while the credit stands upon the books of the reserve bank it can, under the law, be counted as a part of the country bank's reserve and commercial discounts can be based upon it, but the moment it is drawn and paid in this emergency circulation it ceases to be a reserve, and the discounts of the country bank must be reduced accordingly. Under these circumstances, the probabilities are that the central reserve cities would be safe from any very extensive drafts upon the deposits of the country banks.

The alternative for owning the bonds under the provisions of this bill is that in times of stress the banks of the country should go into the markets and purchase the promiscuous bonds which are available under the provisions of the bill for circulation.

It needs no argument to show what the result would be under such conditions, when 7,000 national banks were bidding against each other for bonds which are largely held and controlled by a few bond dealers and the "basement-annex companies" of the speculative banks which are now being organized.

The full realization of this situation could only be understood when the period of stringency had passed and these same banks attempted to realize on the State, town, and district securities which they had practically been forced to purchase.

Is it any wonder that the national banks of the country, which for the last ten years have probably lost more on the rise and fall of Government bonds than they have made in profit on circulation issued against them, should look forward with apprehension and dread to future experiences of this kind with reference to promiscuous securities?

I do not know that I can give any better proof of the danger to the banks of making an investment in these promiscuous bonds than is found in the statement of the author of the Aldrich bill, the quotation being taken from a discussion in the Senate in 1905, when the question of securing Government deposits by promiscuous bonds was up for consideration. At that time, according to the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senator from Rhode Island said:

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand. But do you suppose that a bank in your State or in any State is going to buy other bonds and take the chances of fluctuation? The Government bonds are sold substantially along a certain line. They vary very little in price. The risk of loss growing out of the purchase is infinitesimal as compared with other security.

Take the bonds of the State of Massachusetts, to which I have alluded. A few years ago they were selling far above par. Take the bonds of the city of New York; take the large amounts of bonds which have been issued by States and municipalities throughout the Union. In these days they are fluctuating widely, and no prudent banker could afford to buy bonds other than the bonds of the United States.

But even if this emergency circulation could be issued without a loss to the banks, it would be of little or no benefit even for the purpose for which its author intended it. In the statement made to Congress by Secretary Cortelyou, with reference to the operations of the Treasury during the panic of last year, he says:

As usual, in emergencies the difficulty of obtaining bonds, and other obstructions of detail, prevented the increase in circulation becoming effective to the full amount until some time after the need for it had passed.

Just before the acute stage of the crisis the national-bank note circulation stood (on October 15) at $607,118,742. While strenuous efforts were made, especially by some of the large banks in New York and Chicago, to comply with the expressed wishes of the Department and of the Comptroller of the Currency to increase circulation, the amount outstanding had risen on November 1 only to $611,822,676, and on November 15 to $631,344,943. The most important increase in the circulation took place after the announcement, about to be referred to, of the Government issues of Panama bonds and one-year Treasury certificates, so that the circulation attained on December 1 the amount of $656,218,196; on December 15, $676,914,235; and, finally, on December 31, $690,130,895. By the latter date the urgent pressure for currency had practically ceased, and yet notes continued to be issued in compliance with orders previously received, until the outstanding circulation on Saturday, January 18 last, was $695,927,806.

And yet, during that entire time only ninety millions of circulation was added, with nearly three hundred millions of outstanding United States bonds, and a new issue of fifty millions of Panama bonds, and one hundred millions of United States certificates authorized for that purpose, and the highest issue for any one day, with the entire force of the Treasurer's office working overtime in verifying bonds and counting notes, was three and one-half million dollars.

COST OF CHANGE OF NOTE ISSUE.

There is another feature of this bill to which thus far little attention has been given, and that is the cost to the banks and to the country of putting this so-called emergency legislation into operation, if indeed it is possible to put it into operation at all except after extensive amendment. Under section 6 of the bill, the law authorizing the present outstanding issue of circulating notes is repealed and it is provided that the new "notes shall state upon their face that they will be redeemed by the United States in lawful money on presentation at the Treasury."

This refers of course not only to the proposed emergency circulation, but to all outstanding national-bank notes. Undoubtedly so long as the present notes are in circulation and until they are presented at the Treasury for current or final redemption the change in the law would not affect them, but it would make it impossible for the Treasury Department to reissue them, the purpose of the bill being to have all the bank notes, whether based on United States bonds or promiscuous securities, alike in form and appearance.

The same section requires the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare additional notes to the amount of 50 per cent of the capital of national banks and deposit them in the Treasury and subtreasuries of the United States, so that they may be available for immediate use.

In effect this means the reprinting from new or altered plates of about twelve hundred millions of dollars of national-bank currency and the making or altering of about 13,400 plates, at an expense to the banks of more than a million dollars.

According to the best estimate which I can procure, the making of these plates will require about three years' time, and the altering of the existing plates, if they can be altered, will take about a year and a half. I understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND] has a later estimate that the plates can be altered in forty-eight weeks. In addition to this, there is now on hand in the Treasury Department two hundred millions of national-bank notes ready for use by the banks, which, of course, must all be thrown away, so that the total loss and cost of this change of circulation for paper and printing and transportation charges, according to the estimate which I have received, will be considerably in excess of two and a half millions of dollars.

A further cost involved in this emergency circulation will be in the additional force required to handle the notes and pass upon the securities, and the estimate which I have received for that is an annual charge upon the Treasury of about $230,000.

In addition to this, ten new vaults must be built in the subtreasury cities. All told, making a necessary appropriation of about $5,000,000 for an emergency circulation of which the country could not avail itself to any noticeable extent under a period of from one and a half to two years.

CONTRACTION WILL BE CAUSE.

It is perfectly manifest also that a very serious contraction of the currency would be involved by reason of the fact that bank notes presented for redemption under the terms of this bill could not be reissued, for the redemptions last year aggregated about $250,000,000.

If the notes bore one inscription and were equally available for issue in all parts of the country this difficulty would be avoided, but under the terms of the bill the circulation is to be distributed artificially and assigned pro rata to the different sections of the country and to the different banks, with their name and inscription printed upon the notes as now, so that it would seem almost impossible to deal justly and fairly with all sections of the country and not cause severe contraction in localities, unless the entire issue to replace the Government bond-secured notes was prepared in advance.

As proof of this I submit a statement of circulation worked out in accordance with the terms of this bill and published by the Wall Street Journal on the 31st day of March last:

The Aldrich bill, which has passed the Senate, provides that emergency circulation, which must not at any time exceed $500,000,000, shall be distributed among the States on the basis of the proportion which the unimpaired capital and surplus of the national banking associations in such State bears to the total amount of unimpaired capital and surplus of the national banking associations of the United States.

It also provides that in case the quota assigned to a State is not applied for, the amount not applied for may be assigned to any applying association or associations in States in the same section of the country.

The sections of the country recognized by the Treasury Department are the New England States, Eastern States, Southern States, Middle Western States, Western States, and the Pacific States.

In the following table the Wall Street Journal gives the capital and surplus of all the national banking associations in each State and section, the proportion of capital and surplus to that of all the national banking associations of the United States, stated as percentage, and the quota of the total $500,000,000 emergency circulation to which each State and section of the country would be entitled.

It will be observed that the State of New York would be entitled to more than one-fifth of the entire amount of emergency circulation, and that the six New England States with the five Eastern States and the District of Columbia together would be entitled to more than half of the $500,000,000 emergency circulation.

The proportion of emergency circulation to be assigned to the thirteen Southern States is $10,000,000 more than that allotted to the New England States.

The smallest proportion of the emergency circulation would go to the Pacific States and the next smallest to the Western States.

Under its terms, the bill as drawn makes a direct contraction of one hundred and fifty millions, and prevents any emergency circulation whatever. It also provides for an "emergency currency," which will require four and one-half years for withdrawal and meanwhile is penalized at 9 per cent. Of course this was not intended, but the fact that the bill so reads shows the folly of hastily dealing with so important a subject.

EFFECT ON TREASURY OPERATIONS.

But aside from the mechanical difficulties, which are apparently inseparable from the operation of the provisions of this bill, it is a very serious question as to what the effect will be upon the Treasury Department by the issue and sudden compulsory retirement of five hundred millions of bank notes redeemable by the Treasury in legal tender and payable by the banks themselves in other bank notes. During the last three months of 1907 there was a practically forced issue of ninety millions of bank notes, and for the past month the Treasury has been literally swamped by their return, and the morning statements are now showing more than forty millions of national-bank notes stored in the vaults of the Treasury, unassorted and uncounted, for which the Treasury has been called upon to pay legal tender and for which they can get no returns from the banks until the regular process of redemption has been completed.

While it is not necessary to go into the discussion of this situation at the present time, it is a very serious question whether, with an emergency circulation such as this bill proposes returning in great volume upon the Treasury, and a deficit in the revenues such as now exists occurring at the same time, it would not become absolutely necessary for the Treasury Department to go into the market and buy gold for the redemption of national-bank notes, as they were compelled to do for the redemption of greenbacks in 1894, and ex-Comptroller Dawes admitted this in his remarks the other day.

A somewhat careful study of existing conditions convinces me that this would be the necessary result of enacting this bill into law, if such conditions should occur simultaneously at any time in the future, for it must be remembered that of the two hundred millions added to our monetary stock last year one hundred and ten millions were in gold and only ninety millions in bank notes, and yet the congestion in the Treasury now exists.

During the past three months the redemptions of 1907 and 1908 have been as follows:

	1907.	1908.
January	$31,730,178	$54,425,863
February	20,296,953	29,627,607
March	18,187,815	38,949,474

TAX ON CURRENCY.

But another feature of this patchwork legislation which makes the rent worse than it was before is the tax which is put upon this currency. The past ten years have been a period of wonderful progress and growth for this nation. The development of our industries at home, both in agriculture and manufacturing, has never been exceeded in any like period of our history, and to-day we are looking out upon the world and seeking in every direction for opportunities to extend our foreign trade and develop markets for our surplus products. It is the belief of many people, a belief which I must admit that I share to a certain extent, that the unit cost of production in agriculture and manufacture in this country is not far in excess of that found among our commercial rivals, and that in some industries at least we already outclass them. I can see but little difference between paying a higher rate for wages here than there, and paying a higher cost for the use of money with which to pay an equal wage, and for us to think that we can have an annual recurring circulation bearing a tax of from 6 to 9 per cent and involving a discount rate far in advance of that which we now have, and still be able to compete with countries having an untaxed tool of trade and medium of exchange would seem like folly.

Our strongest commercial rivals, as well as the largest markets for our surplus products, are found in England, Germany, France, Italy, and Canada. In England there is no tax on money. In France no tax. In Canada no tax. In Germany no tax when the bank circulation is covered by gold; beyond that seventy-nine million of uncovered paper can be issued without a tax, and beyond that a tax of 5 per cent. Italy has a limit of circulation of three times its bank capital, and no tax. Why should we handicap ourselves in the world's competition by deliberately doubling our discount rates in periods of our greatest prosperity and development?

I do not believe that the American people will consent to maintaining an antiquated system of bank-note redemption at the enormous cost which will be imposed upon all of their industries under this provision of the Aldrich bill. It is useless to claim that the tax will not be added to the cost of discounts; and to cite, as the Senator has done on page 27 of his published speech, the letters of three foreign bankers in justification of his claim. Every one of these citations is a refutation of that claim, the first showing that "very often and under peculiar circumstances the normal discount rate was allowed to stand," the second asserting that "it must not be presumed that whenever the bank had to pay the tax it would raise its rate of discount to the full extent of the tax incurred," and the third only claiming that the reduced rate had been maintained on "several occasions."

But the circumstances under which the tax is laid in Germany are entirely different from that which would obtain in this country. There the bank is a Government institution and the German treasury shares in the profits, and it can be easily understood how that in times of stress, in dire calamity, such as existed in Germany last fall, the Government might well forego a share of its profits and accept with equanimity reduced dividends on its ownership in the bank by consenting to a lower rate of discount, for a short period, than would necessarily result if the entire tax was added to the normal rate; and yet, even under these conditions, we find that during the panic period of 1907 the official discount rate of the German bank was 7½ per cent, while the normal rate is 3½ to 4 per cent.

How utterly absurd it is, therefore, to claim that with a prior loss of 2 per cent to 6 per cent upon a bond investment, the independent national banks in the United States, with due regard to the interests of their stockholders, would for a moment think of adding to that loss this tax of 6 to 9 per cent upon these emergency notes, and continue discount rates as in normal times.

But this is not all, for it could not be otherwise but that an annual recurring high rate would necessarily extend itself more or less over the normal rate as well, and the ultimate effect would be a partial distribution of the emergency tax over all discount rates in the United States.

EFFECT UPON GOVERNMENT BONDS.

There is another feature of this case which is worthy of our careful consideration, and that is the effect upon the outstanding Government bonds of an artificial increase of the interest rate in the United States and the adoption of a new form of securities bearing higher rates of interest as a basis for circulation.

I think it must be admitted that the adoption of this new system could not possibly stop with the passage of this bill, and that legislation would quickly follow increasing the amount of the issue and reducing the rate of taxation.

We are all familiar with the old motto, "Facilis est descensus Averni, sed retrorso;" and I know of no place where it is more applicable than in the issue of Government paper money. A premium on a Government bond bearing 2 per cent interest can only be maintained by artificial methods.

The English consol to-day, bearing 2½ per cent interest, is selling among the 80s. A United States Government 2 per cent bond sells at 104, solely because of the limited amount and the purpose for which it can be used. The owners of seven hundred millions of these bonds will look with fear upon the introduction into our currency system of a new class of securities, and it will require but one Populistic extension of the provisions of the Aldrich bill to force the bonds of the United States down to their natural and normal value among the securities of the world; indeed, it is a serious question, if this bill should be enacted into law, whether the bonds now authorized for the construction of the Panama Canal could be sold at all under the limit of par which the law places upon the Treasury in its disposal of them.

I can understand how the great bond dealers of the country who hold and control the market for the class of bonds to be used under the provisions of this bill can look with glee upon its enactment into law.

I can understand how the speculative banks which, in defiance of law, if not in direct violation of it, have been speculating in securities in the past and are now forming trust companies and side-door institutions to enable them to enjoy the rich profits of the splendid market which the passage of this bill will bring to them, may be justified in claiming that this legislation, or none, will be the result of the present session of Congress; but I do not believe that the workingman, the farmer, the manufacturer, or the representatives of the industrial forces of this Republic will look upon it as any measure of relief, or will fail to hold responsible the men who vote for it, when the workings of this new system are fully understood and its effect upon those industries realized. They will speak for themselves in the fullness of time.

RESERVES.

Under the national-bank act of 1864 the banks of the reserve cities were required to keep on hand at all times in lawful money 25 per cent, both of deposits and circulating notes, as a reserve.

All other banks were to keep 15 per cent. It was provided, however, that three-fifths of this 15 per cent might consist of balances due to an association, available for the redemption of its circulating notes, from associations approved by the Comptroller for that purpose. And the banks in the reserve cities might select banks in New York and San Francisco where they should redeem their circulating notes, and for that purpose they might keep one-half of their reserve with such banks in cash deposits. The reserve balances of the country banks and the reserve cash deposits of the reserve-city banks were both for note-redemption purposes.

In 1874 the reserve against circulation was abolished and redemption of circulation at the Treasury instituted, with a 5 per cent redemption fund provided, which should count as a part of the reserve against deposits, to be constantly kept good by cash payments by the banks in sums of not less than $500 as redeemed notes were charged up against it.

But the old rule of permitting a portion of the reserve to be kept outside of the bank vault was retained, and it needs but little figuring to show that not only was the reserve in the bank against deposits weakened by this change by about one-third, but it was still further reduced by counting the redemption fund as a part of it, it being wholly unavailable for that purpose.

The Aldrich bill, in its eighth section, proposes to double the cash reserve in the vaults of the country banks and make it two-thirds instead of one-half of the required amount in the vaults of the reserve city bank.

Based on the conditions of the banks on December 3, 1907, this change would have drawn from the reserve and central reserve cities the sum of $201,771,561 and scattered it in small sums among more than 6,000 different banks. It would undoubtedly put each one of these institutions in a better condition to stand a run on deposits such as we witnessed last fall but for the fact that with this change was another which more than offset any advantage thereby secured, for the bill also provided that of this amount $134,515,374 might be permanently withdrawn from use as a cash reserve by being invested in long-term promiscuous bonds, against which 90 per cent of bank notes could be issued which are not reserve money.

A good argument can be advanced for the investment by national banks of surplus funds in railroad or other bonds listed on the stock exchanges of the country, and thereby quickly exchangeable into cash, but, in my judgment, there is neither argument, reason, nor excuse for this provision in this bill which permits unlisted or any other securities to be substituted for a part of the cash reserve of a discount and deposit bank.

It is fair to assume that when an emergency circulation is needed the funds of a bank will be first exhausted in loans, and it inevitably follows that if these bonds are then taken from the reserve as a basis for emergency currency every dollar so subtracted will compel the payment of an equal amount of discounted paper.

Imagine the effect, then, upon the country, in the face of a panic, of compelling the liquidation of several hundred millions of commercial paper in order to secure an equal amount of non-reserve currency. I am very sure that if panic conditions were not in existence prior to such action they would very speedily follow it.

In my judgment it would be better to leave the reserve law as it now is, but to provide that the balances due the country banks shall be held in the reserve city banks and no interest paid upon them.

A far better system yet would be to have these reserves massed without interest in one central reserve institution.

EFFECT OF SECTION 2.

There is another feature of this bill which, whatever its effect may be upon other parts of the country, will be destructive of the national banking system in the New England States.

From the time of the civil war till now the farmers of New England have seen the value of their land steadily decreasing as the result of long-distance competitive railroad rates under which the products of the Western farms have been put in direct and crushing competition with our own. As a result our people have turned their attention from agricultural operations to a great variety of manufacturing industries, and with the growth of our industrial towns and cities has come the necessity for banking facilities, and side by side these industrial and financial institutions have grown up together. Each has developed the other, until to-day they are inextricably mingled in ownership and in use.

Our system of mutual savings banks, with their investments directed and controlled by legislative enactment, provide funds for the loans on real estate and absorb the long-term bonds of our towns and villages and the other fixed and permanent interest-bearing obligations. With us the bank is the mainstay of the factory, and the factory furnishes business for the bank. The enterprising, active, strong men of New England, who have built up its industries, and without a single raw material within its borders have developed industrial conditions which are unequaled in the world, are also the directors and officers and managers of our banking institutions.

Under the provisions of section 2 of the Aldrich bill, as construed by legal authority in the Comptroller's Office and outside of it, the discounting of the notes of these industrial establishments, and even the discounting of collateral loans with the stocks and bonds of our industrial establishments used for that purpose, would be forbidden.

I am confident that in many towns and cities of New England the enforcement of this law would drive from the boards of directors of our national banks the majority of their membership.

However much of merit there may be in a proposition of this kind looking to the divorcing of speculative national banks now controlled by the leaders of high finance, from stock gambling operations, the commercial banks of New England will not accept its provisions.

There is an old saying that "one can lead a horse to water but he can not make him drink," and the inevitable result of the enforcement of this law will be the destruction of the national banking system in the six New England States and the reorganization of those banks as State institutions.

I do not believe that the author of this section of the bill for one moment realized what its effect would be.

BURDEN OF REDEMPTION.

Permit me, now, to call your attention to the effect on the Treasury of the burden of redemption involved in the provisions of this measure.

Up to 1890 lawful money paid into the Treasury for the retirement of national-bank notes was withdrawn from circulation and held by the Treasury until a corresponding amount of bank notes had come in and been canceled.

At that time Senator Sherman, in an effort to stave off the free coinage of silver, promised in the Senate that bank notes should be at once reissued on redemption, and that the money paid in for their retirement should go into the general fund of the Treasury and thence into circulation, thus practically maintaining the general volume of paper money.

In that speech he used this language:

The bank notes will continue in circulation until presented to the Treasury for redemption; they will become in legal effect United States notes, and will only be presented for payment when unfit for use.

So far as their gold-drawing power to-day is concerned, with only one intermediate step, they are as effective as a greenback.

In June, 1893, we had outstanding one thousand two hundred and eighty-seven million dollars of various forms of money dependent on the gold reserve of one hundred millions, and the experience of that time led us to increase that reserve to one hundred and fifty millions.

Since June, 1900, national-bank notes have increased about four hundred and fifty millions, and we now have one thousand seven hundred and fifty millions of various forms of money dependent upon one hundred and fifty million gold reserve in the Treasury.

Add to this five hundred millions of notes possible under the Aldrich bill, and probable at every crop-moving period and excessive stock speculation, and you throw upon this reserve of one hundred and fifty millions, two thousand two hundred and fifty million dollars of money to be maintained at parity with gold, with no other provision anywhere, either in the Treasury or the banks, for a penny of gold reserve against it. If experience has shown that the greenback requires a one-third gold reserve, why should not the banks be required to hold a like amount against the bank note?

I know it is said that we have now a billion dollars of gold in the Treasury, but the fact is that aside from the reserve fund it is almost wholly covered by gold certificates outstanding against it, and the very fact of this enormous increase in our paper money will have a tendency to compel this gold to find a hiding place here or be expelled by a redundancy of paper money to foreign countries.

On page 32 of the Senator's speech he says:

It has not been found possible, and I think it is quite as impossible to-day as ever, to provide by legislation for the retirement of any of these forms of currency.

The same difficulty would exist in the future concerning his emergency currency which he claims exists now with reference to the present issue, and the tendency will be irresistible when we have once entered upon the endless path.

GERMAN SYSTEM.

He attempts to justify this measure by the statement, on page 11, that—

The plan for additional notes which the committee recommend is substantially the plan of the Imperial Bank of Germany, with a change in class of securities required and an increase in the rate of taxation.

I challenge anyone to find a single analogous feature between the two systems.

In the German system there is a single note-issuing power, the Imperial Bank of Germany, practically controlled by an imperial government supposed to have an eye single to the general good.

Here are 6,500 independent national banks, all of them in duty bound to look out for the interests of their own stockholders, and with almost no power as individuals to affect the general good, even if they were prompted by such a desire.

The Aldrich-bill notes are limited to five hundred millions and taxed at 6 and 9 per cent.

The Imperial Bank of Germany can issue notes to an unlimited extent when covered by gold, and this free of tax. A further issue is authorized of seventy-nine millions not covered by specie and also free of tax, and then an unlimited issue, taxed at the rate of 5 per cent, but with a compulsory gold reserve of 33⅓ per cent, and the balance covered by commercial paper at not to exceed ninety days' time and bearing two or more indorsers.

The Aldrich-bill notes are secured by long-term bonds, the legal title of which is transferred to the Government, and the German notes by gold and commercial paper held by the bank itself.

Furthermore, the tax on the German note is not intended to expedite redemption, but rather by raising the rate of discount to restrict an overissue. There is not one single feature of similarity between the two systems.

There is no necessity in Germany or in France for providing any system of forced redemption, for there being but one note-issuing power in each country every maturing obligation, either at the banks themselves or any of their branches, tends by its payment to effectively reduce the outstanding volume of currency.

Here, with 6,500 banks issuing notes and current redemption and retirement being carried on through the Treasury, no man can even imagine what the effect upon the Treasury will be by throwing this additional burden upon it, for it must be borne in mind while under this new bill this new issue can be paid by the banks in other bank notes, the Treasury itself must redeem in legal tender.

It would seem as though we had almost forgotten that a Government Treasury is not endowed with banking functions. A bank is organized to loan money, and from a constantly inflowing stream of maturing loans can meet the notes which it has put out; but while a Government borrows, it does not lend, and has no inflowing receipts, except from taxation, which should be adjusted to its expenditures only.

"EMERGENCY" CIRCULATION NOT NEEDED.

The author of this bill in the opening of his speech said that it must be apparent to everybody that there is no demand at this moment for emergency circulation. I fully agree with him, and I submit the proposition, whether it is not wiser, in view of the experience of the past few years, to provide now for something in the nature of a reform of our banking system.

We have to-day two hundred millions more of money and currency in this country than we had last year, with no probability whatever of anything like the use for it, either this year or next, that we had a year ago. I do not mean by that that I think the period of recovery from the effects of the panic of 1907 are to be protracted to anywhere near the extent of that of the panic of 1893, for in 1893 there was a balance of trade against us of over eighteen millions, while in 1907 the balance in our favor was over five hundred millions.

During the five months from October to March our sales to foreign nations have been nearly a thousand millions, and the balance in our favor for these same months has been $486,000,000. The favorable balance for March was $52,283,748, and indications now point to a balance in our favor for the fiscal year of 1908 of over $750,000,000. Of this balance we have received but a little over one hundred millions in gold, and we have but to continue to make reasonable prices for our products and practice ordinary economy in our purchases to find ourselves in a reasonable time in a safe and sound financial condition again.

While it is not probable that the remaining balance will be settled in gold until the dividends on foreign investments in this country are absorbed and maturing short-term railroad loans abroad are canceled, it is practically certain that if the shipments of the products of our factories and farms continue for a few months longer on a like basis the yellow tide of gold will again turn this way and build up our reserves for the future development of our industries at home.

How foolish is it, then, with this prospect before us, to enter upon a career of money inflation, the only result of which must be to artificially stimulate the prices of our products and bring about another suspension of shipments such as existed before the panic and compel us to send gold back again to Europe in settlement of these maturing obligations.

Better by far to gradually liquidate now than to have stagnation for a while, with a certain collapse again in the near future, for the surplus products must be sold at some time and somewhere, and at prices in competition with the outside world.

Is it not better by a well-organized commission to carefully study the lessons taught by the sore experience of 1907, and when the cries of the demagogues and the charlatans shall have ceased to beat the air and the heat and passion of a political canvass shall have passed away, plan our future course?

Meanwhile the recuperative forces of a naturally vigorous constitution will be doing their perfect work. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BYRD. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much interest to the great speeches I have heard this afternoon as to the causes of the recent panic, and I would indeed be glad if my friends who engaged in this discussion would listen to my remarks. There have been many theories advanced for the financial ailments that afflict the country; but I would have my Republican friends to believe that chief among all the reasons for this trouble, in my opinion, is the fact that the infamous policy of protection has dominated the country for the last forty years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who has just taken his seat, contrasted the peculiar difference in which the recent, as he said, world-wide panic has affected Germany and Argentina; showing that the former has suffered therefrom far more than the latter. There is nothing peculiar or strange about this seeming disparity when we remember that Argentina, next to the United States, is the largest exporter of raw material, chiefly food products, of the world. She feeds one-third the commercial nations of Europe, and having a great foreign market from which to draw financial aid, she is not victimized by every little financial flurry that sweeps her own shores. She is fast becoming our most formidable competitor in the food markets of the world, and not being herself surrounded by an insurmountable tariff wall, she has access to the free markets of Europe for her overflowing surplus, and consequently she can demand money from abroad to meet any crisis at home.

Now, as to Germany, next to the United States she is the most highly protected of all nations, largely dependent, like ourselves, upon her home market for the sale of her products, and consequently every little storm sweeping across her financial horizon produces a panic, just as in this nation. When her finances are congested, her consumers, having no means of getting money, can not purchase her products; her business is paralyzed, her factories close, and her laborers are turned out of employment to tramp the country for bread.

Mr. Chairman, my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] said that our agricultural products had suffered less depreciation in prices on account of the panic than any other commercial commodity. Now, why is this true? It is perfectly plain when considered in the light of the fact that our agricultural products, and especially cotton, is not dependent upon the hidebound home market for its prices. Two-thirds of the crop is sold abroad, where the price of the whole is fixed. This being true, a panic would have to strike all the countries abroad at the same time to materially affect the price of cotton. If needed by other nations, they will take it and pay the prices fixed in the markets beyond the sea. And this is why the evil effects of the panic fell more lightly on our agricultural industry than any other. Of course the panic prevented the holding of the crop for better prices, but in actual price it is mainly dependent on conditions abroad.

In less than thirty days after the panic struck New York half the sawmills in the South were closed down, and thousands of idle laborers were turned upon the country without employment. This was true with the iron and steel factories, as well as many of the highly protected industries. And from this class of enterprises came quite all of the 3,000,000 idle laborers now roaming the country. How many farm laborers have you seen out of employment? Not one.

To further show my Republican friends how disastrous has been this panic to the protected industries of the South, I want to say that a prominent mill man of that section wrote me a few days ago that the lumber industry of the Southern States was in a deplorable condition; that there was no demand for the lumber, and a number of mills were daily going into the hands of receivers. The same is equally true of the protected iron and steel industries at Birmingham and elsewhere. All of this is because they have been nurtured in the hothouse of protection, and having never before realized the dreadful calamity that would befall them by this market-destroying policy. Many thousands of laborers, by their downfall, have been driven into the cotton fields to swell the present crop to such an extent as to threaten coming bankruptcy to that industry.

The rich markets secured at home by the tariff rates, manipulated by the crew of the trusts, gave the highly protected industries a degree of prosperity hitherto unknown in this or any other age or country. Sawmills, furnaces, and factories ran day and night, and the railroads were powerless to handle their accumulating freight. Maddened by the accumulation of riches at home, they forgot the rich fields of trade for their increasing products abroad, and hence when the financial storm broke in New York they withered like a hothouse flower exposed to the burning sun.

This is the logical result of the protective system. Having to depend on the home markets almost exclusively, all the industrial effort is paralyzed at the first approach of a financial crisis. The banks close down, no money circulates, the home people practically quit buying the products of the factory, and the latter, not having any customers abroad, accumulates an overcrowding surplus, and closed doors and discharged labor result.

Does anyone believe that the financial flurry that struck New York last October, if it had been in any other first-class nation, would have produced such disastrous results to her industries as it did to ours? Who ever heard of the breaking of one or more financial institutions in England paralyzing her entire industrial system at the high tide of her industrial prosperity and without notice depriving 3,000,000 of her laborers of bread-earning work? Our recent panic is without a parallel in history, coming, as it did, unheralded and at the noon hour of our national development, suddenly wrecking industries and factories, driving men into bankruptcy and suicide, and making those who were millionaires yesterday paupers to-day. It could not have happened in England or any other first-class nation, for they have learned of the folly of national selfishness and of the futility of depending on barricaded home markets.

England on account of her fair and liberal trade policy has expanded her foreign commerce to such an extent that, unlike this country, she is not wholly dependent on her home consumers. After supplying her 43,000,000 of people at home in 1905 she exported manufactures to the amount of $1,310,000,000, or $30.50 per capita, while ours for the same year was only about $5.30 per capita.

These figures ought to convince the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] of the true reason why England withstood the recent panic better than the United States and Germany. She does not undertake to carry "all of her eggs in one basket," as we do. However violent may be a world-wide financial disturbance, England is better prepared to withstand it than any other nation, for by virtue of her marvelous foreign trade she can draw on the coffers of every country for cash when needed, and nothing less than international bankruptcy could prostrate her industries like ours are now.

Mr. Chairman, it is conceded by many of our best thinkers that 90 per cent of the trusts, of which there are more than 300 in the United States, are the direct fruits of protection. All opposition from abroad being destroyed by the protection schedules of the Dingley law, home industries combine to destroy all local competition—hence a trust. As the tariff profits of a trust increases, in order to keep from the public their outraging dividends, they water their stock by increasing it, ofttimes tenfold, and hence $10 worth of credit is suddenly thrown upon the market with only $1 in cash to back it, and when the least misfortune appears, the dividends fade, the watered stocks go to the wall; then comes the panic.

For instance, take an article which is used in everyday life upon which there is a tariff tax of 50 per cent, which is a modest rate compared with some of the Dingley schedules, and suppose that you, I, and another should form a corporation of a hundred thousand dollars capital to manufacture that article, and then suppose we should form a trust by taking in all competitors in the protected home market, which would enable us to add the 50 per cent duty as extra profit. After all competition has been destroyed and this excessive duty has been added in the way of additional profits, we find the stock is paying a dividend of 25 per cent. Instead of being satisfied with this, the stock is immediately converted—watered—into $500,000, paying a 5 per cent dividend. Thus we have $5 worth of business being transacted on $1 in actual capital, and in this manner hundreds of trusts were formed, sheltered under the protecting wings of Dingleyism, and multiplied millions of watered stocks and inflated credits of every description were thrown upon the market, and since it takes just the same amount of cash to manipulate these inflated stocks and credits upon the markets as it does those that are legitimate, our money supply was wholly inadequate to sustain the bloated volume of commerce.

In this manner I charge that protection is the direct cause of the panic—that it bred the trusts, and the trusts the inflated credits that congested the stock markets of the country and produced the panic, and I charge that the country will never be rid of the periodical recurrence of these financial shocks until we abandon this policy of trust-breeding protection. We may pass the Aldrich bill or any other financial measure, but let me charge you that unless we destroy the prime factor of this evil all the gold buried beneath the Andes coined into American dollars will be inadequate to take care of the trust-inflated credits upon our markets. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Listen, my Republican friends; you are indeed "between the devil and the deep blue sea" on the tariff question. Your household is divided against itself. The distinguished gentleman who now sits in the chair [Mr. DALZELL] a few days ago said that he did not know whether he was in favor of revising the tariff upward or downward, and it does not seem that my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is going to revise it in any way, since, by his ponderous corporosity, he has crushed the life out of all tariff-reform measures in the Ways and Means Committee, of which he is chairman. The President, Senator BEVERIDGE, and other leading Republicans favor a tariff commission, but the leaders of this House, speaking through the gentlemen in the chair [Mr. DALZELL], regard that proposition as unworthy of consideration. We suspect that their chief reason for not wanting this measure is they do not want the public to know how much graft there is in this protective-tariff business. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Taft, seems to have the best chances of any other, except a Democrat, of being our next President, and his idea of protection, as reflected in the recent Ohio platform, is a reduction of the tariff to such an extent as will leave a protective margin to equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. If this means anything, it means a Democratic tariff or a tariff for revenue only, since the difference in the cost of production here and abroad is so insignificant as would reduce the duties under that declaration to a revenue basis, and should he be elected President and stand by this proposition, were I the leader of our party I would clasp his hand in peace upon this question and thereby forever eliminate it from party politics. But if elected, however sincere he might be, he would be powerless to pass any such measure through this House as now constituted. Its leaders represent the limit of high protection and would fight such a proposition in season and out of season.

Is there a Republican on this floor so silly as to think that this country has any confidence in this promise of tariff reform? There will perhaps be a new tariff law, to be known as the "Payne law," but what can the people expect from a measure having such paternity? What a mockery would be such a law! It would be a travesty of justice and a crucifixion of the truth.

Mr. Chairman, the people are not so much concerned about tariff revision as they are about who is going to revise it. Shall it be by the servants of the people or the emissaries of the trusts? In considering this question shall this House be organized into a high court of justice in which all the rights of all the people in all sections will be respected, or shall its proceedings be like those of a star chamber? Shall the millions of consumers be given a voice in making this law, or shall it be prepared by the trusts before Congress convenes and then railroaded through the House without leave to amend or debate? These are questions that must be answered at the November election?

Now, a few words about expanding our markets by reciprocity treaties. What an abortion have been our trade conventions negotiated under the reciprocity provisions of the Dingley law, and what more can we hope for along this line if the party in power are permitted to enact the next tariff law! Did you not hear the distinguished gentleman in the chair [Mr. DALZELL] some time ago say that he was in favor of a maximum and a minimum tariff, and that the minimum tariff must be sufficiently high to protect every American industry, and the maximum tariff must be still higher? And in like manner spoke the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE]. What kind of a reciprocity treaty could be consummated under such a tariff policy? Even the present law is far more liberal in this regard.

The greatest Republican that ever lived, in my judgment, was James G. Blaine, and when the McKinley bill was up for consideration he wrote Mr. McKinley, who was then the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, that if the tax then written in in the bill on hides and other South American products should become a law, it would forfeit to this country the rich commerce of South America, and how prophetic was his utterence in this regard, for since that time, while our favored few have been reveling about the fleshpots of protection, the European nations, by virtue of their free and liberal trade concessions, have appropriated that trade, England and Germany now having more than 65 per cent thereof and we less than 11 per cent, notwithstanding that it should be ours by reason of both political and geographical affinity.

High protection at home and expanding markets abroad are inconsistent; one must succumb to the others. If we ever hope to increase our commerce in other countries, we must liberalize our contracted markets at home. Reciprocal trade concessions are the bed rock of international trade. The history of the world attests the truth of this assertion. Lord Beaconsfield and Gladstone won more markets and riches for England by their liberal commercial statesmanship than were ever opened by all of her armies, while in the great brain of Bismarck was planned a system of protection for Germany so liberal and flexible as to meet her trade emergencies with any nation. But how different is our system, and how abortive have been the reciprocity provisions of the Dingley law. We have outlawed the world at large by our tariff schedules, having erected the same insurmountable barrier against the cross-eyed Oriental and the half-civilized hibrid of South America as we have against the most skilled artisans of Europe. The latter, by competition, might curtail the profits of some American industries, but what have we to fear from the competition of the former? What harm could befall us from the most liberal trade relations with people of that class, and are not they the world's greatest consumers of European products? Indeed, our system of protection must have been conceived in imbecility and born in selfishness.

Mr. Chairman, let me warn you of a prophetic truth, that unless we abandon this market-destroying policy, many of our other industries will undergo the same depressing experience as that visited upon the sawmill and steel industries. Having reached the limit of the home market in many lines of our manufacturing development, we must look to foreign markets or be flooded by overproduction. This policy of overselling at home and underselling abroad can not long withstand the fury of an outraged people, and soon you will witness many of these hothouse industries, now growing rich by robbing at home and dumping abroad, eating the bitter fruit from the tree they have planted. As certain as fate the time will come when they will have to face the competition of the world and have the prices of their whole production fixed by the prices of their surplus sold abroad, however insignificant it may be. Then they will have realized the folly of protection and the necessity of fruitful foreign markets.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BYRD. Grant me one moment in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, for I want to say to my Republican friends that we have everything to sell and nothing to buy, and that unless we destroy this Chinese wall shutting us out of the markets of the world, we may hope for nothing less than to be afflicted for all the years to come with pauperized labor, thieving trusts, and destructive panics. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, at the present session of Congress, Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota has reintroduced his bill for "An appropriation for agricultural and industrial instruction in secondary schools, for normal instruction in agricultural and industrial subjects in normal schools, and for branch agricultural experiment stations."

This is a bill not only of peculiar interest to the agricultural sections, but of vast importance to the people of the entire country.

It is surprising that there should have been any delay in its passage, or that its consideration should have been postponed in favor of projects of far inferior merit.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to have leave to print as a part of my remarks, the text of this bill, a portion of the speech of the patron of the measure, and a letter from the president of an agricultural college of my State.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of his remarks the matter to which he refers. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Mississippi and at his implied request, I object. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi has never objected to a request of this kind from this side of the Chamber, but announced in the beginning that he would object to requests from that side of the Chamber.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not object, inasmuch as leave to print has been given to one of the Members on his side, Mr. HILL of Connecticut.

Mr. MANN. I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The full text of the bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18204) to provide an appropriation for agricultural and industrial instruction in secondary schools, for normal instruction in agricultural and industrial subjects in normal schools, and for branch agricultural experiment stations, and regulating the expenditure thereof.

Be it enacted, etc., That commencing with the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1911, there shall be, and hereby is, annually appropriated, to be paid as hereinafter provided, to each State and Territory and to the District of Columbia, for the maintenance of instruction in agriculture and home economics in agricultural schools of secondary grade and instruction in mechanic arts and in home economics in city schools of secondary grade, a sum of money equal to not more than 10 cents per capita of the population of each State and Territory and the District of Columbia, respectively, as shown by the last preceding Federal or State census: Provided, That in any State with less than five counties and in any State or Territory with less than 100,000 rural population there may be one agricultural secondary school, which shall receive not more than $8,000 annually under the provisions of this act: Provided, That commencing with the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1908, there shall be, and hereby is, annually appropriated to each State and Territory and the District of Columbia, for the maintenance of normal instruction in agriculture, home economics, and mechanic arts in State and Territorial normal schools now established or which may be hereafter established, an additional sum of money equal to not more than 1 cent per capita of the population of each State and Territory and the District of Columbia, respectively, as shown by the last preceding Federal or State census: And provided further, That the amount appropriated to any State or Territory for normal schools shall be not less than the sum of $2,000 annually.

SEC. 2. That the funds thus appropriated for instruction shall be used only for distinctive studies in agriculture and home economics in agricultural secondary schools, and for distinctive studies in mechanic arts and home economics in city schools, and for distinctive normal courses in agriculture, home economics, and mechanic arts in State and Territorial normal schools, and that all States, Territories, and the District of Columbia accepting these funds shall provide other funds with which to pay the cost of providing the necessary lands and buildings and to pay the cost of instruction in such other and general studies as will complete a well-rounded secondary or normal school curriculum suited to the needs of the respective sections of the Union.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall annually estimate to Congress the allotments to be made to the respective States and Territories and the District of Columbia under the provisions of this act and shall annually designate to the Secretary of the Treasury the sum apportioned at not more than 10 cents per capita on the population, to each incorporated city, town, or village containing not less than 2,000 inhabitants for instruction in mechanic arts and home economics, and the sum apportioned, at not more than 10 cents per capita, to the total rural and other population not included in said cities, towns, and villages of the respective States and Territories for instruction in agriculture and home economics.

SEC. 4. That there shall be, and hereby is, annually appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid as hereinafter provided, to each State and Territory for the maintenance of branch agricultural experiment stations on the farms of the agricultural secondary schools appropriated for in this act a sum equal to one-fourth of the sum allotted to it under this act for agricultural secondary schools, said branch agricultural experiment stations to be under the direction of the State agricultural experiment stations now established or which may hereafter be established in the respective States and Territories in accordance with the act of Congress approved March 2, 1887: Provided, That no State or Territory shall be entitled to the benefits of this section of this act until its legislature shall by law have provided for the establishment and the equipment of such branch stations and shall have provided for the annual maintenance of such branch stations a sum at least equivalent to that appropriated annually to the State or Territory under this section of this act; and the sum paid to each State or Territory under this section of this act shall be applied only to paying the necessary expenses of conducting by such branch experiment stations experiments bearing directly upon the agricultural industry of the United States, having due regard to the varying conditions and needs of the respective States and Territories.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to give the agricultural secondary schools to which money is appropriated under this act such advice and assistance as will best aid them to organize and maintain satisfactory courses of instruction in agriculture and country home making, and he is also authorized to give the branch experiment stations established under this act such advice and assistance as will best promote their work.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall annually ascertain whether the said schools and branch experiment stations are using the funds granted to them under this act in an efficient manner for the promotion of the agricultural interests of their respective localities and in accordance with the terms of this act, and he shall make a report thereon to Congress from year to year.

SEC. 7. That each State and Territory, in order to secure the benefits of this act, shall accept its provisions and shall divide the State or Territory into combined agricultural secondary school and branch experiment station districts, the total number of such districts in a given State or Territory to be not less than one for each fifteen counties nor more than one for each five counties or fraction of five counties: Provided, That in States where separate schools are maintained for the colored race the districting and allotment of money shall be so arranged as to be fair to both races, and whether said districts for the two races are coterminous or not coterminous their total number shall be determined by the number of districts permissible under the provisions of this section of this act.

SEC. 8. That the sums hereby appropriated to the respective States and Territories and to the District of Columbia for the maintenance or instruction in agriculture, mechanic arts, and home economics and of branch agricultural experiment stations shall be annually paid, one-half on the 1st day of July of each year and one-half on the 1st day of January of each year, by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the warrant of the Secretary of Agriculture out of the Treasury of the United States to the treasurer or other officer duly appointed by the governing boards of said schools and branch experiment stations designated by State law to receive the same.

SEC. 9. That if any portion of the moneys allotted under this act shall by any action or contingency be diminished or lost or misapplied, it shall be replaced by said State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, and until so replaced no subsequent appropriation shall be allotted or paid to such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia: Provided, That no portion of said moneys shall be applied directly or indirectly under any pretense whatever to the purchase, erection, repair, or rental of any building or buildings, nor to the purchase or rental of lands.

SEC. 10. That it shall be the duty of each institution receiving funds under this act, annually on or before the 1st day of February, to make to the governor of the State or Territory in which it is located a full and detailed report of its operation, including a statement of all receipts and expenditures, a copy of which shall be sent to the Secretary of Agriculture; and on or before the 1st day of September in each year to make to the Secretary of Agriculture on blanks provided by him for that purpose a statement of receipts and expenditures of money under this act.

SEC. 11. That on or before the 1st day of July in each year after this act becomes operative the Secretary of Agriculture shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury as to each State and Territory and the District of Columbia whether it has complied with the provisions of this act and is entitled to receive its share of the allotments herein provided for secondary and normal schools and branch agricultural experiment stations under this act, and the amounts thereupon which it is entitled to receive. If the Secretary of Agriculture shall withhold a certificate from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, for the whole or any part of its allotment, the facts and reasons therefor shall be reported to the President, and the amount involved shall be kept separately in the Treasury until the close of the next Congress, in order that the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia may, if it shall so desire, appeal to Congress from the determination of the Secretary of Agriculture. If the next Congress shall not direct such sum to be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury, and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby charged with the proper administration of this law.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall make an annual report to Congress on the receipts and expenditures, and on the work of the institutions to which allotments are made under this act; and also whether the appropriation of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia has been withheld, and if so, the reasons therefor.

SEC. 13. That Congress may at any time amend, suspend, or repeal any or all of the provisions of this act.

This measure in its beneficent operations will supply a long-recognized deficiency in our scheme of popular education, and will serve to correct a present drift from the country to the cities. This drift, in great measure, has been due to the fact that a large proportion of our country people have not been so educated, as to enable them to make the business of agriculture either as agreeable, or as profitable, as it can be made when the resources of industrial science are laid under contribution for its pursuit.

There is no lack of opportunity for technical instruction in the "professions," so called; but the men in the professions constitute only a small proportion of the world's workers.

Outside of this limited sphere of activities, an immense mass of work is being done by a class of workers who are illy prepared for their tasks. In consequence, much of that work is poorly and inadequately done, and many of the workers, either give up their chosen tasks to begin again under different and more promising conditions, or else drift along in a state of dreary hopelessness, or sullen discontent.

This is not as it should be. "The soil is the fundamental source of our wealth, prosperity, and happiness."

Agriculture should be pursued, and its problems attacked, in the light of present scientific knowledge, and we fail in our duty to the public, when we neglect to afford to the people who work the soil, and live on the farm, the opportunity to become acquainted with the last word of science on its cultivation, and management.

This bill is the logical outcome, the evolution, in fact, of the Morrill Act of 1862, establishing for the first time that system of public instruction in the States commonly known as the "land-grant colleges."

By this measure Mr. Morrill justified himself as a farseeing statesman, and builded better than he knew.

Many flourishing seats of learning which have been most potential in educational work of an intensely practical character, owe their stimulus and, in many cases, their establishment, to the funds provided by this act.

One of the most noted of these colleges is the Virginia Polytechnic Institute, which, beginning with a few score pupils, now has an enrollment of over five hundred. But for this, and like colleges in other States, many a poor, but ambitious and deserving young man, would have been denied the opportunities of college education.

Great, however, as has been the work of these institutions, numerous as have been their students, there is a much larger number of deserving youth, both male and female, who have been, and will continue to be, unable to attend them.

As compared with the great body of eager students outside of these institutions, the number of actual matriculates is relatively insignificant.

It is not an exaggeration to say that the benefits of the Davis Act will reach ten, nay, twenty times as many young men, and young women, as are reached through the present land-grant colleges.

Moreover, the pupils who will be taught in the schools that will be established under this act, will be specially prepared for the courses in agriculture, and mechanic arts, which are such prominent features in the instruction offered in the land-grant colleges, and they will thereby be stimulated to attend these institutions.

Thus, the operation of the Davis Act, will tend to induce a large increase in the number of students at these colleges.

In the old education a young man took his degree in letters, and fancied that it was an open sesame for the tasks that were ahead of him.

In large measure, he soon found that much of his time had been wasted. When he came to select his specific line of work, he looked about in vain for some school of specialized instruction.

All of this has been changed in the purely professional pursuits. Having made his selection of a profession, he finds ready to hand numerous institutions affording the most ample courses of technical instruction. This instruction is thorough, comprehensive, and up-to-date, and is offered in institutions abundantly supplied with funds, either by the appropriations of the States, or the donations of philanthropists. But these institutions do not reach at least 75, or 80 per cent, of the boys and girls who are to do the world's work.

This should be rectified. In the boys and girls of the present, we are educating the workers of the future. The curriculum of the schools which they attend should be broadened, and enriched by the addition of some portion, at least, of that wonderful stock of industrial knowledge which we owe to the researches of the last few decades.

The man who has learned how to grow two blades of grass on the soil which formerly produced but one, does not become a benefactor until his methods are imparted to the public.

But how can the public secure this knowledge, and become acquainted with these, and other methods of improving their condition, unless opportunity is made for its acquisition in some adequate system of public schools?

Whenever suitable provision is made for teaching the country boys and girls, the rudiments of industrial and agricultural education, we will have made a long step forward, toward increasing the efficiency of the individual worker, and his consequent capacity to make the most of his surroundings.

It is a mistake to cultivate in individuals tastes which outrun their earning capacities. Teach them how to secure the things which please the tastes, and then desire and realization will go hand in hand.

Every original advocate of the Morrill Act, every subsequent observer of its operation, ought to favor this measure.

What will be the cost of providing for agricultural and industrial instruction in secondary schools, for normal instruction in agricultural and industrial subjects in normal schools, and for branch experiment stations? The answer is given in the speech of the patron of this bill:

> The sum it is proposed to appropriate is less than 1 per cent of the revenues of the Government, and is based upon an appropriation to the various States and cities of 10 cents per capita of the inhabitants thereof, provided that the sum of 1 cent per capita be raised by them. This means practically appropriating for the industrial education of each pupil of school age 30 cents per annum, or for each pupil actually in school 60 cents per annum.
> There is to be no inequality in the distribution, for the money going to each State will be equally divided between the city and the country people, so that at least one agricultural high school can be maintained in each Congressional district. I need not emphasize what this will mean in the way of opportunity and of education to the children of the rural communities.

If this was an original proposition, the people who make cavilling objections to everything new, would say that it was an experiment. But the experiment has been made in the agricultural and mechanical colleges which were established under the Morrill Act of 1862.

In Virginia we have been entirely satisfied with our experiment on this line at Blacksburg, and thousands of young men who graduated from that school, are now doing useful work in every portion of the United States.

But having tried our "'prentice" hand at industrial and agricultural education, we must go further; having benefitted hundreds in the colleges, we must now benefit thousands in the schools.

An extension of this system will not be a further venture on untried ground, but will merely serve to afford the fruits of a successful experiment, to the eager thousands of boys and girls who hungrily await this boon at our hands. Viewed as an investment, the appropriation provided by this bill will furnish the most fruitful returns.

> It is believed by those well informed, that every dollar appropriated for the Federal Department of Agriculture, and for the State experimental stations, and State colleges, returns to the American people, or rather earns for the American people, at least $20.

Why should the money to be expended under this act be less productive?

The amount of appropriation contemplated by this measure is about $8,000,000. This amount, if the provisions of the bill are accepted by the States, will be sufficient to establish 300 agricultural high schools in the United States.

A very interesting statement is made by the patron of this bill, as to what has already been done in a few of the most progressive States of the country, in the matter of establishing agricultural and mechanical high schools:

> Minnesota, Nebraska, Alabama, Georgia, and other States have demonstrated that the industrial education started in our State colleges, should be extended into a system of agricultural high schools, and into our city high schools. The trend has been to organize an agricultural high school for each group of about ten counties, as has been done in Alabama and Georgia, and to develop mechanic arts education, both in separate city high schools, and as courses of study in general city high schools. Minnesota and Nebraska led in devising and developing schools of agriculture of high-school grade, articulating with the college above, and with both the rural schools and the farms below. Alabama and Georgia have recently taken the lead in establishing one of these schools in each Congressional district. Minnesota and Nebraska have agricultural high schools with 600 and 300 students, respectively. The graduates of these schools nearly all go back to the farm. A very small number go into other vocations, and probably 10 per cent go forward into collegiate courses in agriculture, most of them to become agricultural technicians. These schools have demonstrated so effectively that farm boys, and girls can be educated for country life, and returned to country life, that everyone who looks into the work of these institutions is ready to promote this kind of schools for the entire country.
> To Georgia belongs the credit and honor of first taking the step thoroughly to establish a sufficient number of well-equipped agricultural high schools, to meet the needs of the farm boys and farm girls of the State. Last July the Georgia legislature authorized Governor Terrell to establish an agricultural high school, in each of Georgia's eleven Congressional districts. A State appropriation of $6,000 was provided annually as a current expense fund with which to begin each school. The districts securing these schools, were required to provide at least 200 acres of land, and to erect buildings and equip the schools. The different localities sought to secure the location of these schools. The result was such, that it is inspiring the entire country with an interest and faith in high-school education in agriculture, and home economics. By private subscription Georgia has raised $800,000 with which to establish and equip these eleven schools. Never before have the American people so emphatically expressed their faith in agricultural education. In no way has the South better expressed the fact, that she is rising from the difficulties and depression which resulted from the civil war.

What has been done in Georgia can, and will be done, in other States.

Speaking for my own State, I am sure that Virginia will gladly accept the terms and conditions of this bill. She is already increasing her school facilities in the direction indicated by modern progressive thought. No State has done more for the higher education; no State, in proportion to her means, is doing more for secondary education, save in this one respect of a system of high schools for teaching agriculture, and mechanic arts.

But in this direction too, she has been feeling her way, and only a heavy public debt, and lack of means, have so far hindered her from the establishment of such schools as are contemplated by this measure. When she is given her apportionment under this bill, which will amount to some $200,000 a year, I hazard nothing in saying that she will furnish the necessary lands, and buildings, and funds to establish an agricultural high school in each of her ten Congressional districts.

There is a realizing sense in the South that, great as is the industrial future now opening before our view, after all the cultivation of the soil is to be, as it has been, the chief source of our permanent prosperity. The workers of that soil ought to be as well equipped for their task, as the craftsman for his work.

Increase the efficiency of the farmer's boys and girls; increase their ability, each in his own rôle, to operate the modern devices which contribute to the comforts of the home; put within their reach the opportunity to acquire the knowledge appropriate to their particular function in the home and farm life, and you increase to such an extent the attractions of life on the farm, that the present eager desire of our young men and women to get away from the country to the cities will be counteracted. [Applause.]

The establishment of high schools in the country districts for agricultural and mechanical instruction, will mean that, for the first time, thousands of country boys will learn that farming is something more than mere digging the soil, after the fashion of our fathers and grandfathers; that there is a science of agriculture, just as there is a science of law, or medicine.

He will acquire in these schools that knowledge which will enable him to make his home better and happier. To that end he will learn to lay under contribution the discoveries of science. We have gone too far in the direction of public school education, to stop with the colleges, and common schools. They are well enough in their way, and will be continually improved; but the agricultural high school, the mechanical arts high school, the high school which educates women in relation to the domestic work of the home, these are the schools which must, and will be established, whether this bill is passed or not.

But why should we hesitate to pass this bill? Such a measure is the natural sequence of the Morrill Act. Such a measure became inevitable, the moment that the Morrill experiment became an assured success.

In addition to the amount appropriated by this bill for the high schools, there is a further appropriation of $2,500, to be duplicated by the respective States, to be used to supply branch agricultural experiment stations, for each agricultural high school.

These stations are a necessary part of the successful agricultural high school. Theory and practice ought always to go hand in hand. An experimental farm is as necessary, in connection with instructions in agriculture, or horticulture, or dairying as a hospital and clinics are, in connection with a course in medicine and surgery. As well endeavor to teach anatomy without dissection, as to teach agriculture without a farm.

The average boy or girl considers agriculture, and its cognate pursuits of horticulture, and floriculture, as a dull and prosy round of digging and pruning, perchance of watering and spraying, in which like will produce like, in monotonous succession, for all ages to come. What an awakening will come to such a boy, or such a girl, what a vista of delightful possibilities will be unfolded before his wondering eyes when, in these schools and on these farms, he will be introduced to the fascinating studies of Luther Burbank in the world of fruits and flowers.

We now have one Burbank. As an outcome of the proposed system we may see many successors come forward to carry on with increased results, the wondrous work which he is now doing with such success that whatever is desired in form, or flavor, is apparently produced at will.

On the whole, the purpose of this bill is so meritorious, its beneficial results so certain, and its constitutionality so apparent, that there ought to be no objection to its passage. I am in receipt of many letters from distinguished educators from my own State, approving its scope and plan. One of these letters I will insert in this connection, without giving the name of the author:

Hon. E. W. SAUNDERS, Rockymount, Va.

DEAR SIR: During the present session of Congress H. R. 24757 will be brought up by Hon. C. R. DAVIS of Minnesota. I can not conceive of any move on the part of the Federal Government, that would offer more hope to the State of Virginia. Anyone who leaves the South, and passes through the Northwest, and sees the clean, orderly, scientific agriculture of those States, can not but be impressed by the fact that they have a training which we have not. This is particularly true of Minnesota, which leads the Union in agricultural high schools. There is no reason under heaven why Virginia should not be a dairy State, and rank with Minnesota. When we recall the fact that agriculture was at one time in the history of Virginia its most honored calling, we will see that we can make this true again. Nothing will enable us to do this so well, as high-class agricultural schools in each district.

The merits of the bill are so obvious, the results that its passage and operation will afford are so palpable, that the mere statement of its provisions ought to secure its passage.

What objection can be urged against it? Is it suggested that it is unconstitutional? Then the original land-grant act was unconstitutional. Does some ultra advocate of the rights of the States view it with apprehension? If he does, his apprehensions are easily dispelled. In no way does this measure trench upon, or interfere with the functions of the States.

Out of the abundant revenues of the nation it is proposed to aid the States which are willing to go forward in the work of educating their sons and daughters, so as to make them more capable, more self-reliant, happier, and more efficient. The money is turned over to the States and Territories to be administered for special purposes by local functionaries.

So long as it is expended for these purposes, under the control of State agencies, the amount appropriated to each State and Territory, will be paid over to the proper authorities. Any payment that is lost, or misapplied must be replaced, and until that is done, no subsequent appropriation will be apportioned, or paid over to the delinquent. No money will be paid to a State, in the first instance, until that State has given its legislative assent to the purpose of the grant. Hence, so far from compelling a State to be an unwilling participant in a policy of which it disapproves, any payment to her is conditioned upon her voluntary cooperation.

No community which is opposed to the establishment of the agricultural high schools contemplated by this measure, will be made an unwilling recipient of a forced bounty.

The amount to be appropriated under this measure is ludicrously small, compared with the sums that are expended annually in other directions. Every time that we order the construction of a battle ship, we incur an expense greater than the annual payments under this bill. Lurid pictures of imaginary invading forces landing on our shores, or of the machinations of imaginary enemies conspiring to overrun our colonial possessions, or to exclude us from the enjoyment of our rights as a world power, are usually furnished, when an extra appropriation is asked for more battle ships, or a larger Army. Under the impulse of these fantastic alarms, it too often happens that money is appropriated for purposes of destruction which, if invested by law in schools, or works of internal development, would yield so rich a return of happiness and prosperity that thousands now unborn, would rise up hereafter to acclaim as benefactors the men associated with this legislation.

A battle ship at $10,000,000 is a precarious investment. In a few years, at best, it becomes obsolete, fit only to become a target for the latest monster produced by the experts who devote themselves to playing the endless game of check and countercheck, in the evolution of the machinery of defense, and destruction.

A battle ship, unlike wine, does not improve with age. It can not be added to, improved upon, renovated, or built over. In a short time it is old junk, and its assembled materials sell for a mere song.

A school plant is susceptible of indefinite enlargement, is continually being brought up to date, never becomes obsolete, and like the great universities of the world, increases in usefulness, as it takes on age and prestige. The original investment is never lost. It is the mere foundation upon which future generations will build. We may never see the completed work, but in the flow of time this structure of patriotic hands, and loving hearts will assume grander and more imposing proportions.

Mr. Chairman, many millions have been spent in the cause of scientific research. Many results have been obtained in the prosecution of this research. which open up new vistas of health, comfort, and happiness to mankind. In the interest of the general welfare of our people, in the discharge of our duties as the chosen Representatives of the great American public, we cannot afford not to bring these results within the reach of the millions of boys and girls who eagerly await the passage of this bill.

The amount of money that is needed to set this great project on foot, is insignificant compared with the vast sums that we have wasted, and are preparing to waste, on projects of naval and military preparation against chimerical enemies.

We have done enough in the way of preparation for possible wars.

Call a halt in the wicked and wasteful enlargement of our military expenditures, and the means will be available for this, and many another work of popular interest, and national development. There are many things we cannot afford to leave undone. The passage of this bill is one of them. [Loud applause.]

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has introduced in the House a concurrent resolution for a survey of a continuous inland waterway from Boston, Mass., through Cape Cod, to Beaufort, N. C. This resolution was prepared after a conference with Members of Congress from the south Atlantic coast and from New England. I was present at that conference, and the resolution was prepared after the conference by a committee of which my colleague, Mr. SMALL, was a member.

The survey, under the resolution, is to be made by the War Department, by the route or routes deemed most available, from Massachusetts across the States of New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina, by Long Island Sound, Raritan Bay, Delaware River, Chesapeake Bay, Albemarle and Pamlico sounds, to the Atlantic Ocean at Beaufort, N. C. The estimates are to be for a minimum depth of 16 feet along the entire route and of such depth in excess as may be required for commercial, naval, or military purposes.

It is proposed to appropriate $100,000 for this survey.

Mr. Chairman, I am very heartily in favor of the passage of this resolution, either independently or by incorporation hereafter in a river and harbor bill. This waterway is of great importance to my State, and the terminus of the proposed waterway is in my district at Beaufort. By the river and harbor bill passed last Congress the sum of $550,000 was appropriated for the purpose of dredging the waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort, N. C., and this work is now in progress. The survey has been made, and the titles to the rights of way are being investigated and will be acquired by the Government. This waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort, N. C., is one of the links in the proposed waterway from Boston to Beaufort, for which a survey is asked by the resolution. The continuation of the waterway between the ports of Norfolk, Va., and Beaufort, N. C., northward to Boston, Mass., through Cape Cod, will be of incalculable value to the whole country, in cheapening freight rates, in opening up another avenue of commerce and transportation, in avoiding the dangers of Cape Hatteras and other dangerous points on the Atlantic coast, and of great benefit to the country in time of war for naval and military purposes.

The whole drift of the times is in the direction of improving the waterways of the country. Such improvement has become a commercial necessity. Regardless of the question of cheaper freight rates by water, the railroads of the country are unable to haul the large amount of freight now being transported and can not cheaply or successfully carry the class of freight which can be transported by water. The extension of the Norfolk and Beaufort waterway northward to Boston, Mass., will benefit New England as well as the South, and New England and Southern men are united in asking this waterway at the hands of Congress. The importance of developing our waterways and the popularity of this movement have been distinctly shown and manifested by the investigation and report of the Inland Waterways Commission, of which Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON, chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, is chairman, transmitted to Congress by the President in a late message, and also by the large and enthusiastic meetings of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress recently held in Washington. The President ranks the Atlantic waterway next to the Mississippi.

I want to say in this connection that, in my opinion, the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, of which my distinguished friend and colleague, Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, of Louisiana, is president, has done very much, not only toward shaping public sentiment in favor of the improvement of our waterways and liberal appropriations therefor, but also in bringing to the attention of the country the absolute necessity of such improvement. No man who attended the last session of the Rivers and Harbors Congress and heard the addresses of James J. Hill; Governor John A. Johnson, of Minnesota; Governor R. B. Glenn, of North Carolina, and others could fail to be impressed with the fact that, from every point of view, additional and larger appropriations for rivers and harbors, and especially for the great waterways of the United States, were not only a commercial necessity, but in line with the best and most enlightened policy of our Government. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for leave to print this resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to which I have referred. There has been no objection to printing of bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to print with his remarks the bill which he has indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I am compelled, Mr. Chairman, to object.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. But there has been no objection to the printing of bills.

Mr. MANN. There has been an objection to everything by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. FLOOD. But the gentleman from Mississippi did not object to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] printing something.

Mr. MANN. That trade was evened up.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], I desire to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman objects.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. MANN, Speaker pro tempore, having taken the Chair, Mr. DALZELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20345, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. PEARRE, for one week, on account of important business.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut, for one week, on account of important business.

Mr. MCCREARY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20345, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, I move that the House do now take a recess until 11.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the House take a recess until 11.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 95, noes 49.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that the demand of the gentleman from Mississippi for tellers is dilatory, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair there is no quorum present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I submit to the Chair the question of whether or not that point of order made by the gentleman from New York is dilatory.

Mr. GARRETT. I make the point of order, that it does not require a quorum to take a recess.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; it does.

Mr. GARRETT. Under the rule which has been adopted a recess takes the place of an adjournment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair it requires a quorum to take a recess. In the opinion of the Chair there is no quorum present. The point of no quorum is not dilatory. The Doorkeeper will close the door, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absentees, and the question will be taken on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House do take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11.30 o'clock. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 133, nays 81, answered "present" 10, not voting 164, as follows:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 18, 1908.

The Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE, offered the following prayer:

In my Father's house are many mansions. If it were not so, says the Savior, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you.

And in the prayer of the last supper He says: Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also who shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one, as Thou, Father, art in me and I in Thee, that they may be one in us.

Father of life, it has pleased Him to pray for us in these last words of His life, He prays that we may be one—one in purpose, one in thought, one in work, for the coming of Thy kingdom.

Be pleased to consecrate to all of us here the memories of the past, to keep our memories green, that we may translate those memories into hopes and instructions for these days that are before us.

For every word and work of Thy servants who have gone before and whom Thou hast lifted into that larger life which rests on truth and honor and purity, we thank Thee. For every memory of lives consecrated to the nation and to the world, by Thy servants who have left us, we thank Thee. For every word which such men have spoken which speaks of Thine infinite law and Thy perfect truth, we thank Thee.

And now here is to-day before us, and to-morrow, and all this future, O God, take this nation into Thine own arms. Inspire us with Thine own Holy Spirit, that we may do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with Thee. Make us strong in the infinite strength, that so Thy kingdom may come and Thy will may be done on earth as it is in heaven.

Here is our prayer as it was our Savior's prayer, that we may be made one in Christ Jesus and in Thee.

Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth as it is done in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

PETITION OF THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF OKLAHOMA.

To the Congress of the United States:

Whereas the segregated coal and asphalt commission provided for by resolution of the constitutional convention of the State of Oklahoma have submitted their report to the governor and the legislature of the State of Oklahoma; and

Whereas the report shows that there are about 444,000 acres of land in the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations in the State of Oklahoma that are segregated from the lands of said nations and are not subject to sale, lease, or settlement; and

Whereas this land is situated almost entirely in Coal, Pittsburg, Latimer, Leflore, and Haskell counties, and as long as it is held as it is it is nontaxable, making it very difficult for the counties to maintain their county organization; and

Whereas it is desired by the people of the State of Oklahoma to further investigate the extent and value of the coal and asphalt deposits on said lands, with a view of purchasing the same, provided the same can be lawfully done; and

Whereas it is the desire of the said Chickasaw and Choctaw nations to have the surface of said lands and the coal and asphalt deposits sold to one purchaser; and

Whereas the best interests of the State of Oklahoma demand that the State own the said segregated lands, provided the same can be purchased at a reasonable and fair price: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and are hereby, requested to enact the necessary legislation permitting the State to enter into negotiations with the said nations and with the proper officers of the Government of the United States looking to the purchase of said lands

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATORS FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hons. JOHN T. MORGAN and EDMUND W. PETTUS, late Senators from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senators, the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable their associates to pay proper tribute to their high characters and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in accordance with the time-honored and beautiful custom, we have set apart this hour to speak in memory of a distinguished Alabamian, who for thirty years was an honored and beloved member of the Senate of the United States. I must frankly confess that I am appalled at an attempt to pay even the tithe of a tribute to the life, services, and character of the departed stateman, whose obsequies we have paused to solemnize—for in truth, Mr. President, of all the great men who have served in this Chamber none had a more profound and brilliant intellect, a broader grasp and discernment of economics and government, nor a more sublimated patriotism than JOHN T. MORGAN. Knowing him as I did in life, knowing the disinclination that always possessed him to be acclaimed with fulsome speech or vainglorious praise, any words of eulogy addressed to his memory, other than in simple justice to his public achievements would fail to be in keeping with the spirit of his earthly pilgrimage or of the motives that actuated his conduct among men. During the year 1907, and within the space of a few months, my State was bereft of both her illustrious representatives in the Senate. Scarcely were the garlands with which a grateful and affectionate people had strewn the new-made sepulcher of her senior Senator withered before Alabama was called to fresh lamentations by the intelligence that his comrade in arms and his colleague in honors, EDMUND W. PETTUS, had succumbed to the call of the inexorable Messenger, and he, too, "Wrapt in the mantle of his people's praises," was laid to sleep in the bosom of his cherished State. During this hour fitting tribute will be paid to the memory of this brave, gentle, and useful life.

Senator MORGAN was born on the 30th day of June, 1824, and had he lived a few days longer would have attained the age of 83 years. The last eighty-three years of this Republic is a wonderful story in the history of mankind. The imagination can scarcely conceive and the human memory staggers beneath the marvelous things that have been accomplished in that reach of years. It has witnessed the periods of exploration and discovery, of development and exploitation, of conquest and acquisition, of fratricidal strife—almost dismemberment—and then reconciliation and harmonious reunion. It has seen this Government wage a costly and sacrificial but, as always, successful war for the emancipation of a people struggling to be free from the tyranny of a European monarchy. Those years have produced most of our national literature—they have seen our greatest national tragedies, they have brought the marvels of the arts and sciences, which contribute so much now to the comforts and pleasures of our daily life. A truly marvelous eight decades in all things that go to make a great people, and JOHN T. MORGAN lived through them all, and through them was always an able leader, always abreast with and often ahead of the times.

We have but little data or reminiscence touching the early life of Senator MORGAN. His parents moved from Tennessee to Talladega County, Ala., when he was 9 years of age, and in a country neighborhood he spent his years of youth, and there attended the country school, where were laid the foundations of that intellectual training which in its fullness and maturity was destined to be the admiration and wonder of the world. It is doubtless true that a subsequent love of justice and his profound knowledge of and love for the things of nature received their first nurture and impetus from the primitive and unpolluted environments of his childhood. It is recorded that many of his playmates were Indian children, and his knowledge of their language, customs, and traditions, which in legislative deliberation made him a powerful champion of the rights of the red men, were instilled into his heart and mind by his youthful associations. The educational advantages offered at that time to poor country boys in Alabama were pitifully meager, but in addition to his natural mental sprightliness the future Senator was blessed with a mother who, with patient admonition, daily encouraged him in the acquisition of knowledge and wisdom. Mr. President, it is but another illustrious instance of the godliness, sacrifice, steadfastness, and patriotism of an American mother, wrought into the fabric of a splendid manhood's service to a grateful Republic.

At quite an early age young MORGAN decided to adopt the law as a profession, and having diligently applied himself to his studies in the office of William P. Chilton at Talladega, he was admitted to the bar in his twenty-first year, and entered upon his distinguished career as an advocate and counselor. He located at Selma, but soon removed to Cahaba, and here he received the first real recognition of his brilliant powers of analysis, logic, and delivery, which were to carry him onward to the very front ranks of the legal fraternity.

In 1860 Senator MORGAN was named as one of the electors at large on the Breckinridge-Lane ticket in Alabama. The years immediately preceding that contest were most memorable in the history of American politics from a standpoint of contention and controversy. The great unsettled problem of slavery was being discussed upon every stump and at every fireside. The passion and differing sentiments of the people of the country at large were stirred as in a seething volcano. The impending struggle, despite the earnest efforts of those who sought a peaceful settlement of the controversy, was inevitable. Senator MORGAN upon the great issues involved in that memorable campaign was firm and resolute in his advocacy of the cause which was afterwards so gloriously sustained by Confederate arms. His campaign of the State only served to augment his reputation and standing as a public debater, worthy of the sword of the most dextrous adversary. The ticket upon which Senator MORGAN was an elector carried the State of Alabama, and he was subsequently elected as a delegate from Dallas County to the secession convention.

His first military service was on the staff of Major-General Clemmens, who had command of the State forces at Fort Morgan, where he was on duty until the fort was transferred to the Confederate government. He entered as a private in the Cahaba Rifles, which was afterwards mustered into the Fifth Alabama Infantry, and upon the organization of the regiment he was elected major. This was the command of which Robert E. Rodes was colonel. When this regiment was reorganized, he resigned his command as lieutenant-colonel, and returned to Alabama for the purpose of recruiting a regiment of partisan rangers. This work he accomplished mainly by his own efforts and equipped it without any aid from the government, and was elected its colonel August 11, 1862. In June, 1863, at the instance of General Lee, who was then preparing for the Gettysburg campaign, and who personally notified him of his promotion, he was appointed brigadier-general, but being impelled to the conclusion that his duty was to remain with his regiment, he resigned the commission, but was again in November, 1863, promoted to brigadier-general for conspicuous and invaluable services.

The field of the operation of the command in which he served extended from the Gulf to the Cumberland River, and from Nashville to Bull Run. His command saw constant, active, and arduous service, often far in front of the advancing army, without support or reenforcement, and often dependent upon the courage of its men and the ingenuity of its commanders to prevent capture or destruction.

General MORGAN was always a modest soldier. He had not taken up arms as a profession, but as what he conceived to be a solemn and imperative duty. He was not ambitious of rank, nor was he obsequious in undertaking to gain the favor of his superior officers. "He declined a brigadier's commission when it would have left his regiment without a field officer, and when it needed him; he accepted a brigadier's commission when his regiment, recruited by himself, could safely spare him." He was exceedingly zealous for the comfort and, as far as may be, the safety of his men, and shrank from seeking to obtain glory or praise by the unnecessary and fruitless sacrifice of the lives of his private soldiers.

When the inevitable termination of the war was reached, and when MORGAN and his comrades who survived laid down their arms and quit the conflict forever, there was none among them with a sadder heart than this gallant soldier, for he had loved and served the South "with an affection that hoped and endured and was patient." General MORGAN went back to the people of Alabama to reenlist with them in a greater and possibly more troublous conflict than confronted the people of the South upon the field of battle. Upon every side was the ruin and desolation of war. The old aristocracy of the South, almost feudal in its magnificence, had been swept away. Poverty and despair and desolation were almost the universal condition of our people, but this great man, well knowing the steadfastness of Southern character and its ability to raise itself above conditions that at the time seemed desperate and hopeless, by his calm courage and wise counsel led and encouraged his people in that safe and sane pathway of redemption which ultimately led to our present happy condition. In the presence of conditions that made the most courageous and hopeful falter he never lost confidence in the ultimate triumph of the right. It is a great thing, Mr. President, for one to have been a helpful apostle of cheerfulness through an epoch of despair.

In 1876 General MORGAN was named as Presidential elector upon the Democratic ticket from the State at large. His wisdom and eloquence and powers of forensic argument had ripened and become polished with the passing years. His eloquence and earnestness were irresistible, and in that campaign he achieved yet higher and more enduring honors as a statesman and publicist. The confidence and admiration of his people were so aroused by his eloquence and patriotism that in 1876 he defeated George S. Houston for the United States Senate, one of the greatest and most popular men that Alabama has ever produced. At that time I was a member of the State senate in Alabama, and voted for Senator MORGAN. So great has been the implicit confidence of the people of Alabama in his wisdom and judgment, so profound their admiration for his intellect and statesmanship, so loyal their affection for his stainless and blameless character, that for thirty years, almost a third of a century, the people of a great State retained him as their senior representative in the greatest deliberative body on earth, a striking commentary upon the possibility of reward that may come to a great heart and a great mind that holds itself aloof from "variableness or the shadow of turning."

The Senatorial career of Senator MORGAN, the things that he strived to accomplish, and that he did accomplish, the great national problems that he aided in solving, as well as the great national perils that he labored to conquer, are so well and generally known that it will be useless on this occasion to attempt to augment his public career by their recital. He was a student of wonderful application, and was never content with superficial knowledge of any subject. He was familiar with the history and governments of all nations. His comprehensive understanding made him familiar with social and economic philosophy; his marvelous store of knowledge concerning things of the historical and political world, as well as familiarity with subjects which to the ordinary mind would be of no consequence, justly gave him the reputation of being one of the most learned and erudite members who ever honored this body. He was many times honored with positions of great responsibility that called into exercise the most delicate as well as the most comprehensive knowledge of things and men. His recognized fitness for the position caused him to be named as a member of the Bering Fisheries Commission and also as one of the representatives of the United States on the Board of Arbitration, upon both of which he served with distinguished credit.

Senator MORGAN's advocacy of the Isthmian Canal was for years earnest and indomitable. It is true that he was partial to the construction of this great project across the Nicaraguan route, yet no well-informed person who is anxious to preserve the truth of history may successfully contend that any other American statesman more deserves to be called the father of the Isthmian Canal than JOHN T. MORGAN. By his persistent and successful advocacy of that great enterprise he has builded for himself a monument more enduring than bronze or marble. It was one of the most pathetic features connected with the death of this great man that he was not blessed to live long enough to see the successful completion of this great national undertaking, to which he had contributed so much research, enthusiasm, and persistence.

Senator MORGAN was a man of wonderful perspective, and his mental horizon was not limited by local conditions or partisan convictions. His statesmanship was of that quality "that he could see the near side of far things, and the far side of near things." The universe was his forum and humanity his field of endeavor. Senator MORGAN's life was gentle. In social intercourse he was always affable, considerate, and just. His affectionate solicitude for the happiness of his household was beautiful in its tenderness. He was scrupulously honest and fair in all his dealings with men. "He locked his lips too close to speak a lie. He washed his hands too white to touch a bribe."

Soon after the lamented death of Senator MORGAN, Judge Thomas G. Jones, United States district judge in Alabama, related the following incident that had come under his personal observation a short time prior to Senator MORGAN's death:

I well recall the last time I saw him in Washington, over a year ago. We were friends, and he talked freely in the intimacy of such relation of his past public service and what he hoped to do in the few days which might remain with him. Going to his bookcase, he took down a volume, which I was surprised to find he kept in his library, and read aloud to me this sentence:

"The public servant who fails to act as his conscience dictates for fear that considerations which commend themselves to him will not meet the approval of the people mistrusts those who trust him, and in setting up higher standards of right and morality for himself than he accords to the people the representative often unwillingly betrays their best interests."

He said he had always followed that rule. It is not surprising, therefore, that he frequently led rather than followed the popular opinion of the hour and sometimes resolutely set his face against it.

Mr. President, in addition to all of Senator MORGAN's magnificent endowments of brain and heart and understanding, he was a Christian. His acute philosophy never raised him to that point where he could find any justification for renouncing the old-time religion of his fathers, which he at all times recognized as the last solace for those who had outlived their earthly hope and the last restraint of those who had raised themselves above every human fear. He went to his last reward an earnest believer in the faith of the Methodist Church, in which he had been a communicant from the years of his early life. He is safely entwined within the affectionate gratitude and loyal remembrance of the people of Alabama. His fame as a statesman and publicist will always remain as a common heritage of all the States, and he will go down in history one of the truly great men of our Republic.

In delivering the speech of acceptance of the nomination of my party as a successor of Senator MORGAN in this body, I used the following language, which was then and now is a true expression of my appreciation of Senator MORGAN's greatness and of his service to his people:

I trust that this legislature, before its adjournment, will make an appropriation for a handsome statue to Senator MORGAN, to be erected in Statuary Hall in the Capitol at Washington, under whose dome for so many years, and with such brilliancy, he served his people.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, in all the history of the Republic I believe no State has ever been called upon, by the quick succession of death, to mourn at the same time the loss of two Senators whose ability, integrity, and patriotism was so known and honored in every State of the Union, and who so largely commanded the respect and confidence of the Senate. My colleague is to speak of one of these, and it is my privilege to make some record of the life, services, and character of my predecessor.

EDMUND WINSTON PETTUS was born in Limestone County, Ala., July 6, 1821. He was the youngest son in a family of nine children. His father, John Pettus, was a planter, and a soldier in the Creek war, and his mother a daughter of Capt. Anthony Winston, of Virginia, a Revolutionary soldier. An older brother, John J. Pettus, was governor of Mississippi during the war between the States. General PETTUS was educated in the common schools and at Clinton College, Tennessee. He was admitted to the bar in 1842, and commenced the practice of the law at Gainesville, Ala. In 1844 he was elected solicitor of the seventh circuit. In June, 1844, he was married to Mary, daughter of Judge Samuel Chapman, who was his faithful and devoted wife for more than sixty years. He served as a lieutenant in the Mexican war. In 1849 he went with a party of his neighbors, on horseback, to California.

After his return to Alabama (in 1855) he was elected judge of the seventh circuit, but resigned the office in 1858 to return to the practice, and settled in Dallas County, Ala., where he lived, and continued in the practice, until elected to the Senate, except during the period covered by the civil war.

He entered the Confederate army in 1861 as major of the Twentieth Alabama Regiment, and soon afterwards was made lieutenant-colonel. In October, 1863, he was promoted to brigadier-general for gallant and meritorious service. He was in many battles and was wounded four times. After the war he resumed the practice of the law and never sought or held any political office until 1896, when he was elected to the United States Senate for the term commencing March 4, 1897, and was reelected in 1903 and again in 1907 for the term ending March 3, 1915.

Six children were born to him, Mrs. Lucy Roberts, Mrs. Mary N. Lacey, and a son, Francis L. Pettus, and three who died young. His son was at different times speaker of the house and president of the senate in Alabama.

There is one instance, Mr. President, in the career of General PETTUS that should never be forgotten, because it illustrates the courage of American soldiers, and should alone make his name immortal. Major-General Stevenson, of the Confederate army, in an official report of an action that occurred at Vicksburg on the 22d of May, 1863, says:

An angle of one of our redoubts had been broached by their artillery before the assault and rendered untenable; and toward this point, at the time of the repulse of the main body, a party of about sixty of the enemy, under the command of a lieutenant-colonel, made a rush and succeeded in effecting a lodgment in the ditch at the foot of the redoubt, and planting two flags on the edge of the parapet; the work was so constructed that this ditch was commanded by no part of our line, and the only means by which they could be dislodged was to take the angle by a desperate charge and either kill or compel the surrender of the whole party by the use of hand grenades. A call for this purpose was made and promptly responded to by Lieutenant-Colonel PETTUS and about forty men of Walls's Texas Legion. A more gallant feat than this charge has not illustrated our arms during the war. The preparations were quickly made, but the enemy seemed at once to divine our intentions and opened upon the angle a terrible fire of shot, shell, and musketry. Undaunted, this little band, its chivalrous commander at its head, rushed upon the works, and in less time than it requires to describe it the flags were in our possession.

Gen. Stephen D. Lee, who commanded PETTUS's brigade, commenting upon this action, says:

When the fort was first taken an attempt was made to recapture it by Captain Oden, of the Thirtieth Alabama Regiment, but he and Lieutenant Wallace and every man in the company were killed.

When a call for volunteers was made to again make the assault two companies of Walls's Texas Legion responded to a man; about 20 men were cut off from the right, and either Major Steele or Captain Bradley asked Colonel PETTUS if he was going to tell them how to take the fort. PETTUS replied: "I will not tell you how to take the fort, but will show you," and he took a musket and took his place at the head of the assaulting party. PETTUS arranged with General Lee how he should approach the fort, and to concentrate the Confederate fire upon it until he should signal to cease firing. This was done, and immediately after the signal was given PETTUS and his men rushed into the fort and for the flag on the parapet. It was seized at the same instant by PETTUS and Bradley, and neither would for a moment relinquish it; then PETTUS said: "The flag honorably belongs to the Texans, and they shall have it." The surrender of the Union soldiers in the ditch outside of the fort was compelled by PETTUS cutting the fuses of 12-pound shells so they would explode in a few seconds and throwing them over into the Federal ranks, which resulted in the surrender of a lieutenant-colonel and about 50 men.

On the 23d of May, 1863, General Lee addressed the following note to General Stevenson:

GENERAL: I send you the flag taken by the Texans under the lead of our gallant Lieut. Col. E. W. PETTUS, Twentieth Alabama Regiment. It was as gallant an act as I have ever seen during the war. I have pledged myself to give it to the captors. I beg that you and General Pemberton will bear me out.

Your obedient servant,
STEPHEN D. LEE,
Brigadier-General.

It is also recorded that on the night of the assault the Texans engaged in it unanimously elected PETTUS to be a Texan, and he always considered this one of the greatest compliments ever paid him.

I remember well, Mr. President, during the reconstruction period, when a contest was on as to whether Lindsay or Smith should be seated as governor, and Federal troops were camped about the capitol of Alabama, and it was feared that a collision would occur, that General PETTUS was selected to guide and direct the Democratic cause, because of the universal confidence of the people in his unflinching courage and wise discretion. The results justified this confidence.

In figure he was tall, strongly built, with a noble head and rugged features. His constitution was powerful, his habits temperate and frugal. His integrity and sincerity were never questioned. He was angular in his methods of thinking and language. He was a strong lawyer, brushing aside immaterial issues and driving hard for the main points. He stood at the very front of the bar for nearly or quite forty years. He was a hard worker in his cases, preparing them diligently in advance of trial. He had few of the graces of the orator and but little imagination, and yet few were more successful before juries or on the stump, because he inspired all with absolute confidence in the candor and sincerity of his views.

That he was fearless in the line of duty is shown by his leadership in the desperate charge at Vicksburg. Knowing him as I did, I am sure that it was a strong sense of patriotic duty that put him at the head of the assaulting column and then made him incur the peril of handling shells liable to explode in his hands. He never weighed his own fate or future when duty beckoned him on.

He was of rugged character, strong in his convictions, and aggressive in the maintenance of them. Yet those who knew him best knew that deep down in his breast was a heart tender and sympathetic, always ready to forgive an offense, full of human sympathy, and prompt to kindly action. I have myself seen his eyes fill with tears on being reconciled to an estranged friend.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that a man who nurses an injury and prides himself on relentlessly pursuing an enemy may be an able man, but he can never be either a great or a good man. We may not be able to rise to the sublime height of loving our enemies, these mountain tops of Christian character, giving glimpses of the radiance of the coming world, may be too lofty for our attainment; we may be unable to blot out the memory of a wrong committed against us by those who knew it to be without excuse or justification; but a man who steels himself against forgiveness and goes through life with resentment in his heart will never command the admiration of his people or deserve their leadership. How much nobler it is to have it recorded of a man that he loved his friends and conquered his enemies by the generosity of his disposition, as can be said of this great man.

He had no toleration for a timeserver or a trimmer, and no respect for a man not faithful to his convictions, promises, or duty.

He was a constant reader of the Bible, and nothing delighted him more than to quote some text that would explain or illustrate his opinion or meaning. "Remove not the ancient landmarks which thy fathers have set" was frequently on his lips. In this day of innovation and change, when nothing seems safe from the spoliator, it would be well that none of us should forget this divine command. Another text he seemed to love was "Thine own friend and thy father's forsake not." Only a few days since a report was submitted to the Senate for the repeal of an act, and the committee in its report quoted from a report made last year to the Senate by Senator PETTUS, in which he said:

The pardon of the President in a temporary sense had the same effect as the pardon of our Master, as described in the Bible: "Let the wicked man forsake his ways and the unrighteous man his thoughts and the sin which he has sinned shall be mentioned unto him no more forever."

The people of Alabama, Mr. President, in my opinion, had more confidence in the judgment and wisdom of General PETTUS on any public question, and in his unerring instinct to follow the path of duty and safety than of any man of his generation. It is most remarkable that a private citizen, engaged in the practice of his profession and holding no office to attract public attention to him, for forty years, should, during all that time have had this commanding position and influence in his State.

Mr. President, it is given to few men to be such a factor for good, to inspire so many with the love of truth and integrity and patriotism, and to close the busy years of a long life in the highest position within the gift of his State, and finally, to lay down his life in the harness, with the respect, confidence, and affection, not only of his colleagues in the Senate, but the people of his State.

Talent and genius may command the admiration of men, but to command the respect, confidence, and affection of those who know him for a long life, can only rest upon a character founded in integrity, sustained by unflinching courage, and fortified by a love of justice.

What nobler conclusion can come to one who has lived a long, unselfish, and useful life than to go down to his grave, like Senator PETTUS, after eighty-six years of faithful service, loved and mourned by his people, and honored and respected by the nation.

An affectionate husband, a tender father, a true friend, an upright citizen, a great lawyer, an able statesman, a brave soldier, and a noble soul, passed away when EDMUND W. PETTUS died.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, we have come together to-day not to engage in the regular business of the Senate, but as Senators to reverently raise our voices in speaking of the dead.

I believe there have been a greater number of deaths among the members of this body since the adjournment on the 4th of March, 1907, than during any similar period in the history of the Senate. Neither the old nor the young have been spared. The oldest, the youngest, Senators who but a short time ago were occupying their seats here, apparently in full prime and vigor, have been taken.

Never during my service in this Senate have the two Senators from the same State passed away during the same recess—both in their seats on the day of adjournment and both absent at the reconvening of this body, having passed from earth to another world.

Both the late Senators from Alabama had passed the age of fourscore years, Senator PETTUS being 86 and Senator MORGAN nearly 83. These able and distinguished Senators laid down the burdens of life together. They were neighbors, friends, statesmen, patriots, representing the same city, the same State, the same country. How interesting the fact that these great men should go together through the journey of a long life, through the civic struggles of peace and the fierce battles of civil war, and finally within a few brief days of each other surrender to the common enemy of us all.

Senator MORGAN in many respects was one of the most remarkable men whom it has been my good fortune ever to know. He had just completed his fifth full term in this Senate—thirty years of continuous service. Few have served so long, and fewer still have gained such prominence in the Senate and the country. He very soon rightfully took his place as one of the strong men of the Senate. He was a man of high sense of honor and of marvelous industry. He was always at work and there were few subects with which he was not familiar. He was a profound student, a great reader, with an extraordinary memory, and hence he was seldom surprised in debate by any statement of fact pertaining to the subject under discussion. He had strong convictions on all public questions and was slow to yield to the arguments of others who differed from him. He was a Democrat and loyal to his party on the recognized doctrines and policies of the party, but on questions that he did not deem properly party ones he followed his own convictions of duty, regardless of party.

For many years he took great interest in the construction of a canal connecting the two oceans. Perhaps no man in this country did as much to secure an interoceanic canal. He favored the Nicaraguan route and was greatly in earnest in its advocacy. When Panama was determined upon by Congress Senator MORGAN's heart seemed almost broken, as he felt sure that Congress made a mistake. He fought for the Nicaraguan route with such tenacity and power that he was almost irresistible. He never yielded. He opposed with all his power the treaties with Colombia and Panama—first in committee and then in the Senate. I believe to the day of his death Senator

MORGAN felt that the Panama Canal could never be built. Let us hope that he was mistaken.

Senator MORGAN was appointed by President Harrison as a member of the Paris Fur Seal Fishery Arbitration Tribunal, which was considered at the time to be one of the great arbitrations of the world.

He was also named by President McKinley as one of the commissioners to report on a form of government for the Territory of Hawaii. With the late Robert R. Hitt and myself, he visited the Hawaiian Islands and did his full part in the investigation, the preparation of the report, and the bill which was afterwards adopted by Congress.

For many years I was intimately associated with him. Generally, I think, he was one of the most lovable of men, but, as with most men of strong character and pronounced convictions, he disliked opposition and was a bitter, never-yielding antagonist.

Senator MORGAN was for many years a very able member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and during two Congresses was its chairman. He was punctual in his attendance at the meetings of the committee and was thoroughly conversant with every matter coming before it. There was no man in the country better informed on all questions pertaining to the relations of our Government with the nations of the world. He was always zealous and watchful of the interests and honor of his country. He did not believe that partisan politics should enter into the consideration of our relations with other countries. Such questions are not partisan.

He was specially interested in anything which had a humanitarian object. The Kongo question was a good illustration of this. He brought that subject before the Senate. I remember very well the last time he attended a meeting of the committee. He was exceedingly feeble, but the committee had the Kongo question under consideration, and he could not keep away. He made an extensive statement in reference to the resolution. Several times during his remarks I feared that he was about to collapse. The Kongo resolution was not disposed of at this meeting, and at the next meeting Senator MORGAN was confined to his home by illness, but he wrote me a note, which I will be pardoned for reading, as this was the last subject before the committee in which he was able to take any interest:

"DEAR SENATOR CULLOM: I regret that I can not attend the committee this morning. Please count me for a quorum and cast my vote for the Kongo resolution without change. I regard it as being of the highest importance to get this subject into the hands of the diplomatic branch of the Government as soon as practicable. Unless the matter is so disposed of by the committee without delay, it is now obvious that the Kongo question will become a field of wild, uninformed, and dangerous discussion. I hope we will turn this subject over to the proper authority without any other indication of the personal views of the members of the committee than is stated in the resolution, which is that humanity seems to require a serious inquiry into the conditions that are alleged to exist in the Kongo Free State.

"JOHN T. MORGAN."

Mr. President, as a citizen, as a soldier, as a legislator, as an arbitrator, in all the various responsibilities placed upon him, he brought to the subject great ability, great knowledge, and brought forth important results.

Senator MORGAN has gone from this Senate to that realm from whence no traveler has ever returned. He leaves behind a great name, a priceless legacy of industry, patriotism, and achievement in the interest of his country and of humanity.

Those of us who have been here for many years have seen one eminent Senator after another fall by the way. The older ones in the Senate are nearly all gone and new men take their places, and may we trust and believe that in the future, as in the past, we may not be wanting in wise and good men to guide the destinies of the nation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a sweet old age is more to be desired than almost anything else the world can bestow. To grow old gracefully, keeping the heart young, the mind serene, and the temper sweet is an accomplishment that comes to comparatively few of those who round out the scriptural limit of human life. It means control of the varied emotions and ambitions of the soul, a philosophic view of the disappointments and failures that come to all, an existence in an atmosphere above the level of the envies, jealousies, and hates seemingly almost inseparable from life itself. Such men are rare, and dear old Senator PETTUS was a conspicuous type of that class. Others knew him better than I, and will speak at length of his services to his State and nation. It is sufficient for me to speak a few simple words of admiration for the man as I knew him during his service in this body, and of his history as gleaned from his modest biography in the Congressional Directory.

Senator PETTUS's long life of four score and six years covered the most momentous epoch in the history of the Republic. Born shortly after the second war for independence, a grandson of a Virginia soldier of the Revolutionary war, he was himself a soldier in his youth in the war with Mexico. In his maturer years he served gallantly as an officer of high rank in the Confederate army. His was an adventurous and stirring career, for, beside his military service, he was one of the intrepid pioneers who in 1849 braved the perils of the savage Indian tribes and the still more savage wilderness, and crossed the continent with a party of companions to seek for gold in the magic sands of California.

Yet in spite of a life including so much of hardship and of hazard, Senator PETTUS was singularly kindly and gracious with his fellows—literally as brave as a lion and as gentle as a child. These contrasts of character are fortunately not infrequent in the heroes of our country. The utmost manly courage has, time and time again, been associated in the great men of America with the greatest warmth of heart. This combination always results, as it did in the case of Senator PETTUS, in a strikingly winning and noble personality.

For sixty-five years, or almost the allotted life of man, he was a lawyer actively engaged in the practice of his profession, save only as this was interrupted by his service in the field and his adventurous experiences in California. His professional career was distinguished by fidelity to duty and a constant effort to deal justly as between man and man; and though his professional life in Alabama brought him no great political honors or financial emoluments it did earn for him such a high place in the esteem of his fellow-citizens that in the mellow autumn of his life, at 75 years of age, he was nominated and elected to the United States Senate, the first political office for which he had ever been a candidate, and six years thereafter he was honored with a reelection to another six-year term. Though he came thus late into this Chamber he quickly earned the admiration and affection of his associates. He was a true Senator—a man of noble experience and ripened wisdom—and his career here has left all of us the richer for the privilege of his acquaintance. His State may well cherish the memory of his long and honorable service as one of the most precious of her heritages.

If Senator PETTUS had an enemy it certainly was not in Washington. Here he was respected by all, and greatly loved by his associates. Learned in the law, skillful in debate, full of humor, and always solicitous for the welfare of others, he gained a place in the confidence and affection of his associates that was sublime. Senators on both sides of the Chamber vied with each other to do him honor, and his death came to us in the nature of a personal bereavement. He is missed. His gentle admonitions are no longer heard; his strong, vigorous treatment of great questions is remembered and cherished. When he died, a real gentleman passed away and the world was made poorer because of that fact. But he had acted well his part, had lived up to the full measure of duty and destiny, and at a ripe old age passed out of our sight into the mysteries of the life beyond. It seems to me that he had accepted what Aristotle told the world to do centuries ago, "Live as nearly as you can the immortal life." Thus living he doubtless died in the full belief that somewhere in God's universe there must be time and room to complete the great work of development and progress. All we can do is to mourn him and tenderly place on his grave our tribute of affection and veneration. No; one thing more we can do. We can believe that death is transition, not annihilation, and taking the words of Washington Gladden as our own we can say:

> Assume that death ends all, and you have a theory of the universe which confounds your reason and scoffs at your sense of justice and takes the nerve out of your courage and freezes hope at the bottom of your heart. Assume that death ends all, and the springtime has no promise for you, and the sunrise no gospel, and the stars in the black vault overhead mock you at your prayers.

As we saw Senator PETTUS during the last year of his life we might well have applied the words of Joaquin Miller to him, using the first and last verses of one of Miller's beautiful poems:

> He walked the world with bended head.
> "There is no thing," he moaning said,
> "That must not some day join the dead."
> * * * * *
> And then the old man smiling said,
> With youthful heart and lifted head,
> "No good deed ever joins the dead."

And so we say to our departed friend, "Adieu for a brief period, when those of us who live as you lived 'the immortal life,' will again be joined in a higher and sweeter companionship than that of this world. Adieu."

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, my acquaintance with Senator MORGAN commenced with his service in this body in March, 1877. He came here with a well-earned reputation as a soldier and civilian.

He had held a high commission in the Confederate forces and had won a reputation for efficiency and zeal in that service. He demonstrated very soon that the devotion and zeal so given were thereafter to be exercised in the discharge of his duties here.

He entered into the service here with that earnest and intelligent zeal that marked his service in this body for thirty years. He took an active part in the work of this body, being a constant attendant of its sessions and a careful and constant watcher of the work of the Senate.

He accepted the final results of the war with a proper spirit, exhibiting neither humility nor hatred, but with the spirit of a patriot he sought in every practical and constitutional method to heal the wounds inflicted in that conflict on the Government and people and to bring about that spirit of amity and friendship so necessary not only to the happiness of the people, but to the very existence of a government such as ours.

He was well fitted for the duties of a senator. He was industrious, learned, and full of love for the Government with which he had so lately contended, and endeavored by his service here to efface as far as possible all recollections of the war. If he came into the Senate with any of the animosities engendered by the war, he did not show it, and he compelled his associates here, by his intelligence and zeal for the public welfare, to equally forget and to accept him as a coworker in the interest of all the people in every part of the United States.

While he loved the people in the section from which he came and the whole people of the South, he loved the people of every section of our common country. By his conduct in the Senate he deserved and secured not only the confidence of his associates here, but the confidence and respect of the people of the United States irrespective of party affiliations.

He was learned, wise, and patriotic, and his death was a loss to the cause of good government everywhere. His record and his reputation are safely incorporated in the legislation in which he took an active part during the thirty years that he served in the Senate.

His opinions were formed after much study and consideration, and when once formed he adhered to them with great pertinacity, regardless of opposition, announcing them with positiveness, yet without arrogance.

He was for many years an earnest advocate of a canal across the Isthmus by what has been known as the "Nicaragua route," and the files of the Senate will attest not only his industry and zeal in the matter, but his wisdom as well. He did not approve of the canal proposed by the French, and he insisted to the last that the Panama Canal would disappoint its supporters if it did not prove an entire failure, and he often asserted that the Nicaragua route would eventually be recognized as the only feasible route.

He was a firm believer in the capacity of the people for self-government; a believer in rights of the States to manage and control their own local affairs; but while so believing he never minimized the power of the General Government in the affairs of the nation.

He was able to distinguish between the powers delegated to Congress and those reserved to the States and people.

He was a lover of justice, a fair opponent, advocating and defending his position with the evidence of much research and learning. He was courteous always in his treatment of those who differed with him. Of him it may be said, he was a Senator worthy of the best days and best traditions of the body that he graced so long.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, the memory of the man whom we meet to honor here to-day is worthy of all the praise that is due one who has lived an eminently useful and unselfish life, animated by high ideals and using his talents for the benefit of his fellows.

Senator PETTUS lived long beyond the ordinary limit of human existence, but those eighty-six years were crowded with good deeds, and when he died there was not one who could not say that his had been a life well spent. Devotion to duty was one of his notable characteristics, and he at all times strove to impress it upon those around him. Just entering upon a successful career as a lawyer, he ignored brilliant prospects to serve his country in the Mexican war; just as, later, he again took up arms in a struggle in which he again saw his duty, and in which his ability, his zeal, and his courage brought him high rank and the respect and honor of all who knew him. He was always close to the fundamentals of life, building upon that sure foundation a character broad and strong, which no storms of passion could shake, and no waves of prejudice could undermine. He once unconsciously showed to me the secret of his moral strength and his wide human sympathy. He was telling me of his experience in 1849 when he went overland to California by one of the old trails. He said that he had resolved to take, and that he did take, to the land of gold the best law library that California could have. I wondered at such a resolve and expressed my surprise that he should transport by ox team thousands of miles the heavy tons of Alabama State reports, the bulky volumes of reference books, and all the court decisions which take so much space in the library of a successful lawyer. He smiled, and said that all those were not necessary; that his library—the best and most complete of any ever taken across the Plains—was composed of the Bible and Shakespeare. Here, I at once understood, were the sources of his success as a lawyer and a man. From the Bible he imbibed those firm principles of justice which always characterized him, and from Shakespeare that wide sympathy with humanity which made him a loyal counselor and a wise judge.

When Senator PETTUS first took his seat in this Chamber he was nearly 76 years of age. He had already spent a long life in work, which had brought to him the honor and respect of all who knew him. The high and responsible positions which he had occupied were already more in number and more important in character than fall to the lot of most men. And in all of them he had displayed an uprightness, disinterestedness, and public spirit that had endeared him to everyone with whom he came in contact. These qualities were recognized at once when he took his seat in the Senate, and in consequence of them he became one of the most respected and influential members of this body. On whatever subject he spoke his words carried weight and were listened to with pleasure and with profit. And with a colleague who possessed a character equally high and with abilities acknowledged to be of the first order, the State of Alabama was here represented in a manner which gave her a commanding position.

Senator PETTUS believed in the States rights and that they had never been delegated to the Federal Government. He was democratic in every sense of the word. He was always close to the people, being one of them in aims and sympathies, and striving for their advancement and well-being. This made him a true American, of which he gave evidence in his eulogy of the late Senator Hoar when he said:

> It sometimes happens in republics like ours that men affect to care nothing for their own ancestry and even ridicule others who are not of the same disposition. But the American does not live who would not be proud of the fact if he could truthfully state that his ancestor was a signer of the Declaration of Independence or served his country faithfully in the Revolutionary war. And such pride should be cultivated. It makes patriots and heroes by stirring the ambition of the young men to serve their country with all their power in peace or war and to work so as to become well qualified for such service. It creates that spirit of high and heroic daring displayed by England's great admiral at Trafalgar, when he exclaimed: "Victory or Westminster Abbey," and gained the greatest naval victory and a most honored place in Westminster Abbey on the same day.

He did not think that our Statuary Hall was dedicated to receive statues of great Americans simply to honor the illustrious dead. It was also to "fire the souls of generations living and to come" and to teach them that no labor is too great, no danger too imminent, no endurance too long in the service of their country if they aim to be among those honored for wise and faithful counsel or for brave and noble deeds.

I think it would be difficult to find words expressing a higher patriotism than those of Senator PETTUS just quoted. He who will live up to the ideals which these words express need have no fear that his name will not in the future be remembered with honor. And this was the spirit in which not only he but his colleague served the Republic here. In his earlier life Senator PETTUS performed brave and noble deeds in the spirit of self-sacrifice, which glorifies the acts of men. Here, in this Chamber, he gave wise and faithful counsel, based on the experience of a long life of honest endeavor and sympathy with mankind. A few days ago there was read here a report prepared by Senator PETTUS before his death, which contains this quotation from the Bible:

> Let the wicked man forsake his ways and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and the sin which he has sinned shall be mentioned unto him no more forever.

I think that these words very clearly indicate the attitude which Senator PETTUS bore toward the world—one of kind consideration for the imperfections of man and a ready willingness to blot out from the past of those who have returned to righteousness all memory of the results of weakness, of ignorance, or of mistakes. His conception of a man worthy of the respect and honor of his fellows is, I think, portrayed in the words spoken in this Chamber in eulogy of a friend soon after he first took his seat here, and may be applied now to him:

He never claimed to be better than other men. He was simply a true man, trusting in God and trying to keep His commandments. His personal life was pure, and his conduct as a private citizen and in official places was free from any suspicion of stain. He was too proud to think of doing a mean thing, and he was too brave to consider how any duty or responsibility might be avoided.

Such was his idea of the character of a man whom through the stress of war he had come to know well; and such is our conception of the character of Senator PETTUS, whom we were able to know well through the stress of those struggles of a different nature which necessarily arise in legislative business. "He was simply a true man, trusting in God and trying to keep His commandments."

May we not learn a lesson from the life of this good man that will aid us in our struggle to so live that it can be said of us, as we now truthfully say of him, that in every walk of life, in every position of responsibility and trust, it was his creed to honestly and fearlessly do his duty as God gave him the light to see his way?

May we not profit by this example? May we not inscribe upon our banner the motto:

Show us the truth and the pathway of duty,
Help us to lift up our standard sublime,
Until earth is restored to its order and beauty
Lost in the shadowless morning of time.
Teach us to sow the seed of many a noble deed,
Make us determined, undaunted, and strong,
Armed with the sword of right,
Dauntless amid the fight,
Help us to level the bulwarks of wrong.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, Senator MORGAN was a remarkable man. I do not say this in the beaten way of eulogy, but merely as the statement of a truth. In any company of men gathered for a serious purpose, of action or debate, his presence would have been felt and noticed. It was easy to disagree with him; it was impossible to ignore him. In whatever he said or did, whenever he took part in any controversy no one failed to recognize that here was a real and powerful human force and one bound to make itself felt.

It is not for me to attempt to tell the story of his full and active life or to mark the course of his distinguished career. Mine is a much humbler task. I would fain gratify my own feeling of friendship and affection for Senator MORGAN. I should like, also, to give some expression of the sorrow which his death brought to me personally. But most of all, I desire to honor his memory, so far as I can, by placing in our record my estimate of him as a man and as a Senator.

I had known Senator MORGAN well by reputation and slightly as an acquaintance before I entered the Senate and while I was serving in the House. After I took my seat in the Senate I came to know him well, and later, when I began my service with the Committee on Foreign Relations, I learned to know him very well, indeed. The better I knew him the more I liked and respected him. He was a man of wide accomplishments and master of an extraordinary and minute knowledge of those subjects in which he was interested. I doubt very much if we have ever had a Senator who knew our relations with other countries, both past and present, and the political conditions of foreign nations so thoroughly as Senator MORGAN. He was a tireless worker, and yet I have often wondered where he found time to gather all the information he possessed and to master all the details of every question which he took up for consideration. All this information, all those details, whether of diplomacy, of politics, or of engineering, he had under complete control and could pour them forth at any moment, marshaled and ordered and following each other in perfect sequence. He had an extraordinary gift of expression. Combined with his mastery of details this gift often led him to a greater length of speech than was profitable to his cause. But no matter how or when he spoke, whether on the spur of the moment or after careful preparation, his sentences always fell from his lips complete and finished. In him fluency never degenerated into loose phrases or slovenly speech. His English was remarkably good and always pure and simple. He had a profound reverence for the noble language which was his birthright, and never failed to show his respect for it, as he did for all the great traditions of his race and country. It is the fashion to be heedless of this splendid inheritance and to disfigure it with slang on one side and weaken it by feeble artifices which are supposed to be fine writing on the other. Senator MORGAN had no patience with either defect and, much and often as he spoke, never failed in respect and care for the "ample speech, the subtle speech," he used so well.

He had survived nearly all his contemporaries in active life. The generation to which he belonged was one which had met great problems and looked war in the face. It had certain ideals which, whether we accept them or not, have, unfortunately, gone out of fashion. But the important fact is that the men of his day had ideals, both in the conduct of life and in politics. In a time like our own, when it is too much the habit to sneer at ideals and regard them as impracticable sentimentalities, it is well to remember that these men of ideals who belonged to the past were a hard-fighting, brave, and peculiarly effective generation. It is equally important not to forget that now, as always, it is only the men of ideals who in the long run can move and guide the people, for however vivid may be the admiration for mere success, those whom the people really trust and follow must be men who are not content to minister to their appetites or their prejudices, but who bid them raise their eyes and beckon them forward to the heights beyond. We may, in our wisdom, have changed all this, but the nobler instincts still remain ready to start into life at the master's touch. One might easily differ with Senator MORGAN as to the ideals which he followed as the years of his long life succeeded one another in their ceaseless march, but one could never fail to respect their possessor or to admire the indifference which he showed to money in an age of extreme money worship, and the ardor with which he pursued objects which had no personal value to him, but which, in his belief, would benefit his country and mankind.

There never was a better or more thorough American than he, or one who made the welfare of the United States more absolutely the test and touchstone of every act and of every policy. But his patriotism was not that of the village or the parish. He knew too much of the history of other countries; he had dealt too constantly with large affairs to be provincial. But his guiding star was what he believed to be the large and permanent interest of the United States, and that interest he wished to promote and defend with malice toward none and with charity toward all, but yet without flinching and without fear.

Like most strong, determined men of decided convictions, he was ready always for battle, and the fighting spirit would blaze out sometimes very quickly. But he carried no grudges. When the fight was over the war ceased, so far as he was concerned, and at all times, no matter how aggressive and combative he might seem, he had a fund of sane and cheerful humor which was never lacking and was always one of the charms of his companionship.

When all is said, however, of his ability and his learning, of his many accomplishments, and of his long and distinguished public service, that which stands out most sharply in my memory as the dominant note in his character was his complete independence of thought and action. He may often have thought mistakenly, but he always thought for himself. If he expressed an opinion, you could be sure at least that it was his own. No one did his thinking for him. I have seen him oppose a President of his own party and support the policy of his opponents with equal cheerfulness, because he was satisfied that the one was wrong and the other right, and yet no stronger, no more loyal party man ever lived. His sense of the dignity of the Senate was as strong as his sense of his own dignity, and far quicker in assertion.

As a man he took orders and directions from no one; as a Senator it never occurred to him that any outside influence could touch or control him, although he would consider with the most entire respect all that any great officer of the Government wished to say to him. He was quite ready to advise and consult with others, but the final decision must be all his own, and when it was reached modification became difficult and abandonment impossible. He was a stubborn fighter, and possessed a most extraordinary capacity for developing theories in support of his position and then defending them, no matter how difficult they might appear, with remarkable force and ingenuity. With this ingenuity and pertinacity combined, those who did not agree with him often and quite naturally became impatient, but no one could fail to respect the energy, persistence, and fighting capacity which he always displayed, even under the most adverse conditions. But behind it all was the dominant note, a firm courage, a lofty and fearless independence of soul. I always think of Senator MORGAN when I read Swinburne's noble lines in the Prelude to The Songs before Sunrise:

Save his own soul's light overhead,
None leads him, and none ever led,
Across birth's hidden Harbor-bar,
Past youth where, shoreward, shallows are,
Through age that drives on toward the red
Vast void of sunset hailed from far,
To the equal waters of the dead;
Save his own soul he hath no star,
And sinks, except his own soul guide,
Helmless in the middle turn of tide.

He remained among us, working to the last, fighting back the weakness of age and the attacks of illness, with undaunted spirit and with unflagging interest in the great policies he had at heart, and in the great questions he had striven to settle.

The end came to him after a long life spent in the service of his State and country. At his advanced age, after years of toil in which he had never spared himself, death was not unexpected. But it none the less brought a sense of deep sorrow and of great loss to his State, to the country, and to all who had been his friends of many years in the Senate. Upon his associate, the friend of a lifetime, the blow fell with crushing force, and Senator PETTUS, who was honored and beloved by us all, soon followed his colleague. The friendship and affection between these two venerable men was very fine and very touching. I do not think there was a member of the Senate who watched them as they sat and talked together here day after day who was unmoved by the love and confidence and attachment they showed for each other. Such a relation between two men of such an age, still engaged in the active work of public life, is as much to be admired as it is rare in our experience. Nothing could have been more pathetic than the silent grief of Senator PETTUS when his colleague died. The slender cords which held him to life snapped, and in a few weeks he followed his friend to the grave. They were two impressive figures in the Senate, as eminent in service as they were admirable in friendship. They leave a memory to be cherished and honored among all who knew them, and especially among us who had the privilege of serving with them.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, my knowledge of Senator MORGAN amounted to little more than what I saw of him in the public service, but that was enough, and of such character as to reveal the real man, for it went beyond what occurred on the floor of this Chamber, and embraced years of the closest intercourse in the work of the committee.

The RECORD bears witness that he was an untiring worker, who discussed elaborately every great question of his day. To those who only heard him it was a constant marvel how he could find time and, in his latest years, command the strength necessary for the exhaustive speeches he made, for they show the widest observation, the closest study, and the most thorough investigation.

But all who served with him in committee work soon learned that what to the ordinary man in the matter of speech making is such a burdensome labor was to him but a restful recreation.

He was blessed with exceptionally good health, studious tastes and disposition, a rich vocabulary, and a marvelously accurate and retentive memory. Seemingly he never forgot anything that he either heard, read, or saw. In consequence his mind was not only well stored with useful knowledge, but that knowledge was at all times available.

All this is indicated by his speeches in the Senate. But it was in the freedom of the committee room where his brilliant powers were exhibited to the highest advantage.

Although a ready and forceful debater, and a good extemporaneous speaker, his speeches in the Senate were generally carefully prepared and delivered from manuscript.

He practiced none of the arts of oratory, and made no effort at display of any kind, but usually read in a straight-forward way, entirely unmindful of the style or manner of his delivery.

In consequence, to those not specially interested in the subject he was discussing, his speeches sometimes appeared dry, formal, uninteresting, and hard to follow.

For this reason they frequently attracted much less attention than they deserved.

But in the committee room, where there was less formality and, as a rule, no previous preparation of what was to be said, his discussions were of the most entertaining and instructive character.

He always spoke in a modest, unassuming, conversational tone and style, rarely showing even the slightest excitement in voice or manner, but, although he spoke extemporaneously, nevertheless his remarks had the same broad sweep of thought, the same logical arrangement, the same completeness of illustration and application that characterized what he said in the Senate. For reenforcement and illustration he drew at pleasure, with accuracy and generously from history, art, literature, science, personal experience, and every other source of knowledge.

The time of the committee was, of course, always limited, but that did not seem to hurry him or to cause him to slight any point, nor did the time he occupied seem to excite the impatience of even those of his fellow-members who differed from him and desired to answer the views he expressed.

He was always a grand old man, venerable in age, in the Senate, and in appearance, from whom all wished to hear to the full extent he might be willing to speak.

He was invaluable to his colleagues who differed from him as well as to those with whom he was in accord, for no point or phase of any question escaped his notice or failed to receive at his hands the fullest elucidation.

Those who agreed with him were strengthened in their opinions by his presentation of the strongest arguments of which their case admitted, while those who differed felt that if they could answer him there was nothing more to be feared; they had heard the worst that could be said in opposition.

My first service with him was during the year preceding the Spanish-American war. The Cuban question in some form was before the committee at every meeting, both regular and special, and we had many special meetings during that period on that account.

The Democratic members of the Foreign Relations Committee at that time had been selected from among the ablest Democrats in the Senate.

With Senator MORGAN, as representatives of his party, were associated in that service, George Gray, David Turpie, JOHN W. DANIEL, and Roger Q. Mills.

They were all men of the highest character and of the highest order of ability, but it is no disparagement to any one of them to say that no one of them so completely mastered every detail of that complicated and troublesome subject or did so much to illuminate the dark places and make clear and plain the course for our Government to pursue as did JOHN T. MORGAN.

In those days, the first of my service with him, I came to admire him not only for his ability, his wide range of knowledge, and his zeal in the discharge of all his duties, but also for his sensitively honorable character as a man, his kindness and gentleness of heart, his quiet, unostentatious demeanor, and the politeness and consideration he uniformly showed to his opponents in his discussions with them. No matter how much aroused he might be, no matter how earnest he might become, no matter how acutely he might differ from his colleagues, he never permitted himself, in making answer, to show the slightest disparagement for either them or their arguments, but throughout was always as chivalrous and generous as the typical knight of the olden time.

I came to admire, respect, and almost affectionately regard him, not only because of the virtues mentioned, but because added to all these noble qualities he constantly exhibited the loftiest patriotism. In all that he did he was scrupulously jealous of his country's honor, good name, and highest interests.

One uninformed might well have imagined, learning that he had participated in our civil war, that he had been a leader on the Union side, for no follower of Grant could have been more loyal to our Government than was this white-haired old veteran who had distinguished himself as a follower of Lee.

All these early impressions were confirmed and intensified by the long years of service that followed.

He probably did more hard work, made more speeches, and labored more incessantly along every line of opportunity to secure the construction of an interoceanic canal on the Nicaragua route and to oppose the location of that canal on the Panama route. He showed more feeling on this subject than on any other in which he took a special interest. He gathered information from every source, until he could present more as to the climatic and other natural conditions that was favorable to the Nicaragua route and unfavorable to the Panama route than any other man living.

In one carefully prepared address after another he laid all this information before the Senate. In connection with it, and as a part of the same investigation and work, he developed and presented all the legal aspects of the two propositions. It seems impossible that anyone at his advanced age could have performed such a great labor. It would not have been possible except only for the fact that he was so thoroughly equipped with knowledge, and had such a logical mind and such a fluency of speech that to address the Senate on such a familiar topic was really a relief rather than a labor.

He never exulted over success, and seldom showed disappointment when defeated.

The Nicaragua case was one of the exceptions to the general rule. In that instance he did show the keenest disappointment—almost despondency; not, however, because of anything personal to himself, but only because he thoroughly believed we had made a mistake amounting to an irreparable disaster in rejecting the Nicaragua and accepting the Panama route.

It would have been to him gratifying in a personal sense to have been successful in a controversy in which he was so thoroughly enlisted, but it can be safely said that as in that case, so in all others, he was patriotic enough to subordinate self to the public good.

Probably every member of the Senate, on both sides of the Chamber, who differed from him in that matter regretted that his sense of duty compelled him to do so, for all felt that he had labored so zealously, consistently, self-sacrificingly, and patriotically that in every personal sense he thoroughly merited a victory.

It is impossible to recall his last years of service without at the same time recalling Senator PETTUS, his colleague. They were widely different men in some respects, but they were both so venerable in fact as well as in age and appearance, and both were such typical representatives of the highest and best type of American citizenship, men of such probity, such uprightness, such scrupulous integrity, such general nobility of mind and character, and with all so thoroughly in harmony in all their aspirations and in all their efforts that their State and the whole country might well be congratulated upon the high honor of having such representatives.

They had both been officers of high rank in the Confederate army. They had distinguished themselves in that service as in every other they undertook, but they were also representatives of that highest and best sentiment of the Southern people which led them when their cause was lost to accept the situation in good faith, adapt themselves to its requirements, strive to bind up the wounds that had been inflicted, make a union of States in sentiment as well as in name, and bring about a common development of the whole country whereby the prosperity, honor, and good name of the American nation might be advanced not only at home, but throughout the world.

It will stand forever to the credit of Alabama that she continued these two remarkable men in the public service until the end of their days. They have left a record of which their families and friends, their State, and the nation may always be proud.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. President, the death of Senator JOHN TYLER MORGAN removed from the United States Senate a distinguished statesman, a great lawyer, a wise legislator, a faithful soldier, and a conspicuous citizen.

The Republic, no less than Alabama, may lay wreaths of laurel and cypress on his grave, for although he was a native Southerner, typifying all that is purest, noblest, and most attractive in Southern nature, his thirty years' service in the United States Senate was performed in behalf of our entire country.

I first met Senator MORGAN at the close of the civil war, and I was deeply impressed with his utterances about the war, and his views about the duty of the Southern people to submit in good faith to the results of the war and strive for peace, progress, and prosperity. He had not been prepared by military training for service in the army, but he was of the very best type of the Southern volunteer soldier and was courageous and careful, ready and resourceful, dauntless of danger and undismayed by disaster.

He entered the army as a private soldier, and was soon made major of the Fifth Alabama Regiment, and then colonel, and later brigadier-general, and after a while he resigned as brigadier-general to again command his old regiment, and was subsequently again commissioned as a brigadier-general, which position he held until the close of the war.

In military life, as in civil life, he was the architect of his own fortune. He was not the beneficiary of heredity or environment. He came from the great common people, and had no illustrious lineage to give him eminence or emolument; no fortune or fame to attract attention or admiration, but he began at the bottom, and when his life ended he was at the top.

I had business relations with Senator MORGAN before he was elected United States Senator, and I had good opportunities to study his intellect and character. At the time of his election as a United States Senator he was an able and successful lawyer, and a leader at the bar of Selma, Ala. My service with him in the Senate and on the Committee on Foreign Relations gave me additional knowledge of his intellect, energy, fidelity to duty, and splendid equipments. It may truly be said of him: He never touched a subject that he did not illuminate and exhaust; he never encountered a problem that he did not solve, and he never had a friend that he did not retain. It was the dying boast of Pericles that he had never made an Athenian weep, and the friend of Senator MORGAN may boast that no Alabamian ever blushed because of an ignoble word or deed of Senator MORGAN.

Entering the United States Senate March 5, 1877, and being reelected five times, it may be appropriately said his life work was in the United States Senate, and here his brilliant record was made. In the Senate Senator MORGAN took the highest rank as a great constitutional lawyer, and being for many years a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, he closely studied all matters connected with our foreign affairs, and he ranked as one of the greatest authorities of his time on international law. He possessed a wonderful fund of knowledge and a wide range of information, he spoke with readiness and fluency, he was logical and convincing, and he appealed to reason rather than to the emotions.

The financial policy of the Government engaged his profound attention and closest study when he first entered the Senate, and his speeches on financial questions were logical, interesting, and luminous. His first prepared speech was on a question which at the time attracted wide attention, and was known at the "Stanley Matthews resolution to pay the bonds of the United States at the option of the Government in gold or silver of the standard value," and this speech immediately won for him recognition as one of the great speakers of the Senate.

Guizot, in his history of France, declares that "great events and great men are the fixed points and peaks of history." Very few men have ever lived in our country who were actors in so many great legislative events as Senator MORGAN. He performed his part conspicuously and faithfully in the great tariff struggles when the Morrison tariff bill, the Mills tariff bill, the McKinley tariff bill, the Wilson tariff bill, and the Dingley tariff were considered in the Senate.

He was prominent and conspicuous in the great debates on free coinage of silver, and on the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act and other coinage laws.

In the parliamentary struggle and great debate on the so-called "force bill" Senator MORGAN was among the ablest, most indefatigable and earnest speakers and workers who finally secured the defeat of that measure.

As a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations he took a leading part when war was declared by Congress against Spain and when Cuba was made free and independent.

When he entered the United States Senate there were but thirty-eight States in the Union, and he participated in all the legislation enacted by Congress in connection with the admission of eight sovereign States.

It was, however, as an earnest, persistent, and able advocate of the greatest engineering enterprise of all time, being the construction by the United States of an interoceanic canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, that Senator MORGAN achieved his greatest distinction.

He was many years chairman of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and the labor he performed in connection with problems relating to interoceanic canals was stupendous, and perhaps never equaled by an other member of a parliamentary body on one subject under consideration.

He did more, perhaps, than any other Senator to develop sentiment in Congress in favor of the United States Government furnishing the money and building the canal, and his knowledge of legal, engineering, sanitary, and meteorological questions connected with the various canal projects was not equaled by any other man. His valuable acquisitions and contributions, embracing not only his own thoughts, but the thoughts and convictions of the best engineers and scientists of many countries, will not only attest the power of his intellect and energy, but will be of great value to our country.

The abandonment of the Nicaragua route which he advocated for so many years was a grievous disappointment to Senator MORGAN, but after the Panama route was chosen and necessary legislation enacted, he did not oppose appropriations or try to impede or thwart the success of the world's greatest enterprise.

It is immaterial to his fame that the route finally chosen was not the route preferred by Senator MORGAN. The salient, conspicuous fact is that an interoceanic canal, to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, is being built by the United States Government, and when completed, among those entitled to a great share of honor and credit will be Senator JOHN T. MORGAN.

During his long career in the United States Senate many high honors came to him. Among them was his appointment as a member of the commission selected to prepare a system of laws for the Hawaiian Islands after those islands became the territory of the United States. He was also appointed in 1892 by President Harrison as one of the representatives of the United States on the Bering Sea arbitration court, which met in Paris, France, the following year, and he served with distinguished ability on this notable tribunal.

Senator MORGAN took a deep interest in everything that benefited the whole country, and he watched with pride and satisfaction its progress, its wonderful achievements, its magnificent success, its extending Christianity, its industrial and educational advancement, its glorious heroism, and its tender and generous charities, with liberty, law, and order smiling on a happy, contented people, the progress and possibilities of whose country can not be estimated or measured.

He loved his family and his home and the great State that honored him so long and that he honored with faithful service and with devotion that was never exceeded. He was with Alabama in her gloom and in her glory. By his speeches he infused new life into the energies and aspirations of the people of his State, and no man took a deeper interest or by his eloquence and argument encouraged more than he did the development of the resources, the erection of furnaces, the construction of railroads, and the cultivation of the soil.

He saw the issues of civil war fade in the distance and the animosities and horrors of civil strife give place to fraternity and friendship and questions of commerce, trade, tariff, and finance. He had stood with his countrymen of the South in their defeat, disaster, and disappointment, and he rejoiced with them in their rehabilitation, restored happiness, and marvelous onward march to prosperity and wealth.

Senator MORGAN was wedded to high ideals and took but little interest in the ordinary pleasures of the world. He liked excellence and perfection wherever they could be found. He loved the great party to which he was loyal without shadow of turning all his life, and whose principles and policies he upheld with unsurpassed eloquence and unanswerable argument for more than a half century. His faith in the people and in our form of government was strong and steadfast, and his pride in the Senate and his jealous care of its constitutional rights, prerogatives, and dignity were conspicuous and seemed to grow stronger as he grew older.

No man in his life better illustrated the forceful words of Burton's Kasidah:

Do what thy manhood bids thee do, from none but self expect applause. He noblest lives and noblest dies who makes and keeps his self-made laws.

He died full of years and full of honors, and future generations will view with admiration his great personality, his splendid intellect, his unblemished record, and his service to his country of the first magnitude.

He has fought a good fight; he has finished his course; he has kept the faith.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Presdent, it is with profound sorrow that I rise to-day to do honor to the memory of the late Senator EDMUND WINSTON PETTUS, of Alabama, who "passed over" during our recess last summer, after having performed his duties as a member of the Military Committee long after Congress had adjourned.

When I bade him "good-bye" for the remainder of the summer, I did not expect it was to be a long farewell, and that I would not see his venerable face again. I mourn him, not only as a fellow-member, but as a dear old friend. To me he was the embodiment of the true meaning of the expression "a Southern gentleman," courteous, honorable, and upright. I have heard many stories of his bravery and gallantry during the Mexican war and the civil war, and of his brilliant rise from private in the ranks to brigadier-general. His experience and knowledge of "things military" made him a very valuable member of the Senate Military Committee, on which he served for many years. Notwithstanding the slight infirmities which his advanced age brought him, his intellect was as brilliant, his judgment as keen as that of the average man of fifty. Old age had touched him very gently, and he died, as I am sure he would have wished, before his mind was impaired or his physical infirmities became master of him.

"He has written his virtues and memory on the rocks, and his faults have we written upon the sands." The love and confidence of the people of Alabama, and appreciation of his service to his own beloved State and people, as well as to this nation, is attested by the fact that he continuously served them as one of their representatives in the United States Senate from the time of his first election thereto until the time of his death. We live and gain friendship, love, affection, and confidence in what we do for God and humanity, and this life is but the pathway to eternity—a sweeter and lovelier world—and where Faith, Love, and Charity reign supreme, where fame, power, and wealth are unknown, and where the crown of reward for this life's efforts is awarded.

He firmly believed in a reunited country and was ever ready and willing to lend his mite to weld more firmly the boundaries and in the erasing of any sentiment hostile to the interests of these United States. He was always found advocating liberal appropriations for the support and maintenance of our Army and the betterment of that service—a soldier as well as a statesman. Senator PETTUS was a man who, like many other old soldiers who had fought and endured the hardships of war, yet retained no bitterness and believed in the strengthening and reuniting of the different sections of the country. He had suffered honorable defeat, had seen his beloved South, for which he had so gallantly fought, conquered, and yet no man had the interests of the Union more at heart in later years than he.

My first acquaintance with Mr. PETTUS was formed during the first year of my service as a member of this honorable body, but which can hardly be said to have been formed under the most pleasant circumstances, for it began during the time when he was taking a most active part in support of the contention against my title to a seat in this body; but I did not at that time, nor have I ever had cause to believe since, that he was not conscientious and honest in his contentions and that he spoke his true convictions. That fact has been fixed more firmly in my mind by our after association and friendship, which were of the most pleasant nature.

We served together as members of the Committee on Military Affairs, and it was during our service together as members of that body that we were thrown in close touch with each other and the warmest personal and confidential friendship grew up between us. That friendship was of such a nature that upon one occasion, when leaving the committee room after a meeting, he put his arm upon my shoulders and said: "Senator, if anything should happen to me that I should have to be taken home from Washington in my wooden overcoat, I want you to promise me that you will go with me." He well realized the fact that the fast-flying hours had destinies in them, and that our journey through life is but our journey to death, and that while the pilgrimage of some may seem sweeter and calmer than that of others, yet they have the same earthly ending—death.

Such a beautiful character was that possessed by our departed colleague. The Angel of Death has taken him away from the turmoil and strife, cruelty and injustice of this world and has numbered him among those to whom God has given his beloved sleep.

Sweet hours of peaceful waiting,
Till the path that we have trod
Shall end at the Father's gateway
And we are guests of God.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, in the long period of eventful years that preceded the civil war the South had been favored with a school of brilliant and able men in the halls of Congress, whose renown extended throughout the entire country. And while that great strife had wrought havoc and destruction on all sides among the people of the South, it had not wholly destroyed or exhausted the supply of wise and able statesmen and legislators. There were still a number of brilliant and forceful men who survived the tragic ordeal of the great struggle. And, tempered as they were in the fiery furnace of war, they were in some respects better equipped and more highly inspired for the great task of serving their reunited country than were the great statesmen of antebellum days. Great trials subdue the harsher and colder intellectual side of our natures and make us more charitable and sympathetic to our fellows. They make us more responsive to the needs and demands of our common humanity and make us readier to find a remedy for the wrongs and perils afflicting and threatening the social and economic fabric.

Foremost among the great statesmen and legislators of the South who survived the great civil war was our late colleague, Senator MORGAN. He came to this Chamber in 1877, tempered in the fiery furnace of war and its most trying aftermath—reconstruction—a learned and trained lawyer and one of the ablest of debaters. In this body of so many able men he at once took, and held to the end, a leading part. His vision and work from the very beginning and throughout the long period of his public service were those of a statesman rather than a mere legislator, addressing himself to temporary and transitory affairs. He always considered great public questions from constitutional and national standpoints and bearings. His range of vision and his argument covered the entire scope of the problem in hand. Any subject that he took up and discussed he would exhaust. He left no "terra incognita" in that behalf. Many brilliant men fail because of lack of industry and application. They rely wholly upon their power of speech and look to their associates for a supply of law and facts and piece these out with their metaphors and glittering periods, oblivious oftentimes of the fate of the measure after it has been baptized with their oratory. Not so with Senator MORGAN. He was the most industrious legislator I have ever met. There was no limit and no end to his industry and research. He was not content to borrow or take things at second hand. He always went back to original sources for data, facts, and information, and hence it came to pass that when he discussed a measure he could handle it in all its aspects and bearings. His remarks on any subject were not only illuminating and brilliant, but always highly instructive to his associates. He was a mine of learning and research from which all of us gathered wisdom and knowledge.

He was a man of strong convictions and indomitable will, and never a mere caterer to popular clamor or popular favor. When after careful investigation and research he had come to a conclusion and made up his mind as to the merits and quality of any measure there was no swerving him from the path he had marked out for himself. It mattered little to him whether many or few concurred in his view; he felt that he was right, and that was all-sufficient to him. He felt that it was his duty to point out the right course to the Senate, and when he had done that thoroughly and fully, he did not feel called upon to hunt for votes or to resort to any private logrolling to repress or promote a measure.

While Senator MORGAN may not, in the popular acceptance of the term, have been regarded as a great orator, yet no one can deny that he was one of the greatest, most forceful, and most instructive of debaters. He had no use for and wholly eschewed the ponderous and glittering philippics of a past generation. He may fairly be regarded as one of the fathers of that modern school of oratory which aims to convince by a clear statement of facts, by true logic and sound argument, rather than by rhetoric or an appeal to the passions. There was an assurance and a calm serenity about his speech that tokened his full mastery of the subject and carried conviction to his hearers. He spoke because his mind was full of the subject, and because his insight, study, and research craved and impelled utterance. And what a flow of pure, clear, and undefiled English was his speech!

On several occasions I occupied the chair while he was addressing the Senate at length and wholly extempore, when I made a special note not only of the substance, but also of the form of his speech. Not only was his argument clear and logical, but his periods and sentences were perfect and conformed to the strict rules of grammar and rhetoric, and needed no pruning or correction for a permanent place in the RECORD. I am informed that he never corrected his extempore speeches, and I am quite sure he never had occasion so to do. Few if any Senators ever equaled him in this respect.

Many able speeches lose much of their force from a lack of earnestness and sincerity in the speaker. Not so with him. He was always earnest and sincere, and never more so than when addressing the Senate. His great profoundness made him a serious man. The problems of life were to him serious, and his duties as a Senator were to him the most solemn and serious of all. His devotion to his duties and his continued and persistent industry and unflagging zeal could not be excelled. The range of legislative subjects is so extensive that most of us can only keep in touch with and understand fully those which pertain to the committees of which we are members. As to other subjects we look for guidance and instructions to other committees and their members. But Senator MORGAN seemed to have a knowledge of every bill on the Calendar and of its scope and object. His legislative vision was omniscient, but he was never supercritical or obstructive. He was always kind and ready to lend a helping hand to a new Senator, and never objected to the consideration of a measure for the mere purpose of showing how scrupulous and watchful he could be and how important it was to check the exuberance of a new member. He was an omnivorous reader and a great student of history, well versed in the history and political status and condition of all the governments of the Old World.

He was one of the first of the older Senators to meet me and greet me when I first entered the Senate. I shall never forget the kind and encouraging words he uttered on that occasion; and, next to this, what struck me most forcibly was the familiarity he manifested with the people and the institutions of that small country on the northern verge of Europe—Norway, the land of my birth. Even that small country had found a place in his historical curriculum. He seemed as familiar with that as one would naturally suppose him to be with countries like Great Britain, France, and Germany.

Though he was a profound lawyer, exceedingly well versed in the fundamental principles of the Constitution and the common law, yet he had never become so saturated with these that it had dwarfed him and unfitted him, as is the case with some great lawyers, for the generous and liberal consideration of all the great problems that enter into and are essential to the well-being, prosperity, and happiness of this country. He dwelt in the spirit rather than the dry letter of the law. When he felt he was right—and he never advanced unless he was conscious of being right—there was no limit to his patience, persistence, and perseverance. Though on occasions he seemed to stand almost alone, yet he never shrank or flinched. The courage of his conviction was so intense that he never faltered. And what a grim, fearless legislative Spartan he was! In my mind's eye I still see him standing at his well-known desk, erect and determined, hoary with wisdom and with age, instructing the Senate on great public questions in choice, terse, and clear English. Even those who did not agree with him could not help but admire and respect his sincerity, his thoroughness and fearlessness. And all of us found something to learn, something we did not know, when he addressed the Senate.

Such men as Senator MORGAN give a character and standing to the Senate among the American people which it could not have without them. When he passed away he was one of the great patriarchs of this body who had helped to bring us back into the promised land of a reunited country, one in heart, in spirit, and in aspirations, a country that we all love, that we live for, and are ready to die for.

These tributes that we pay to his memory to-day, these garlands of speech that we strew on his grave, are feeble compared with the tributes that he paid his country by thirty years of faithful, honest service in the Senate. In the fullness of years, when his great life work was ended, he bade us a final farewell, final as to his mortal presence, but not final as to the inspiration that comes to us from his life and the work he wrought and accomplished. That spirit that was his will survive to us so long as we are faithful to the high and noble standard which was his.

Grand old Southern Puritan, you are with us no more, but the memory of your noble and upright life, of what you did and sought to do for the good of humanity, will be cherished by your associates to the end of their days. Alabama has been represented by many noble and great men in the Congress of the United States, but by none nobler or greater than Senator MORGAN. His most lasting monument will be not in the granite or marble that is placed over his tomb, but in the records and files of the United States Senate.

May the spirit that guided him be our guide and mentor to the end that what has been said of him can be said of us—that we have been faithful to our trust and duty.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, one by one the old landmarks of our political life are passing away, one by one the links which connect a glorious past with the present are sundered. The departed Senator in tribute to whose memory this day has been set apart by reason of his great strength lived ten years and six beyond the three score and ten years spoken of by the psalmist as the alloted period for man's earthly existence. And though in the natural course of human events it was apparent that his life of usefulness and honor must soon be rounded to a peaceful close, yet his death came as a distinct shock to those who loved him well. It is given to few men to have received the measure of love and devotion accorded to him, not only by his own people, but by all who knew him. I served with him for four years in the Senate, sat around the table with him in the committee rooms, learned to know him and to love him in his daily walk of life, and it is with the profoundest respect and admiration for this noble example of a long and useful life that I am constrained on this occasion to pay the simple tribute of a few words to his memory.

I will leave it to others who are more familiar with it to give the detailed history of his life—a life stretching almost throughout the length of one century and into another, and so full of usefulness and of good deeds that hardly a man of his native State but felt his death a personal loss.

Senator EDMUND WINSTON PETTUS was cast in heroic mold—heroic in stature, heroic in character, heroic in intellect. Destined by nature to be a leader, a man of action and of strength, his young life was cast in troublous times, and he early left his impression upon the history of his State. Such was their confidence in his ability and integrity that in times of peril he was more than once made almost the arbiter of the fate of his people. Especially will his services be recalled during the dark days that followed civil strife. When it seemed that in the heat of passion the South was to be delivered into the hands of the carpetbagger and a race but lately out of bondage, Senator PETTUS, by his coolness and his courage, the leader of a small band of determined men, forced back the wave of anarchy and confusion that threatened to engulf them. As his was the leading spirit in that period of struggle, so when the people of Alabama came into their own again there was nothing in their gift which he might not have had for the asking. But he was not attracted to a public career, preferring rather to go back to the practice of that profession to which he had devoted his life. Death has lifted him now above us, and we can view his character in a clearer light. Looking backward we are impressed with the fact that his was a life well rounded to a fitting and harmonious close. From early manhood destined to play an important part in the affairs of his people and his State, his life was full of action as befitted his character. He early became a man of mark, but in the fullness of his life certain events and characteristics stand out with peculiar distinctness.

Unlike his colleague, Senator MORGAN, for whom his devotion was most marked, he won his fame not in the public forum, but in the private walks of life. Until his seventy-sixth year he had never held office except of a judicial character. Then he expressed a wish to round out his life in the Senate of the United States. The people of Alabama, delighted to honor him whose life for more than three-quarters of a century had been a blessing to his fellow-man, elected him to the highest office within their gift. He never had but one contest—his first election—when two great men of Alabama were both aspirants for the same honor. At each succeeding election by the legislature he was unanimously reelected, and at the time of his death had yet eight years more to serve, having been already elected to succeed himself at the expiration of his term in 1909.

In the Senate of the United States his influence was not measured by the length of his service. He sprang at once into prominence and became a national figure. Entering public life at an age when other men are ready to lay aside the active duties of life, without legislative experience, he yet speedily impressed himself upon this body. His familiarity with public affairs, his great legal ability and training, his devotion to duty, and his wonderful fund of common sense soon marked him as a man of mind and power, and the wisdom of his counsel was not unheeded by this body. His coolness and his self-control, his vast store of knowledge, and his power of command over men marked him a great leader either upon the battlefield or in the public forum. Had he entered the Senate earlier in life, had he been bred a parliamentarian, he would undoubtedly have attained the foremost rank and left his impress upon the affairs of the nation as he has upon the history of his State.

Senator PETTUS was not a politician. He despised hypocrisy and subterfuge. He never espoused a popular cause to curry favor with the masses, nor was it ever necessary for him to do so. Simple, straightforward, unaffected, of rugged honesty and sincerity of purpose, he followed the dictates of his own conscience without regard to popular approval or favor. And though he loved the people, yet he could not be swayed from the path of duty by false clamor or unhealthy public opinion. Born under the régime of the "Old South," imbued with the doctrine of State rights, loving the South, her people, and her traditions with a fervor amounting to passion, he viewed with disfavor and suspicion every measure which seemed to him to point to a centralization of power in the hands of the Federal Government.

Senator PETTUS came of martial parentage. His mother was the daughter of Capt. Anthony Winston, of Virginia, a soldier of the Revolution. He served as a lieutenant in the war with Mexico, and when the irrepressible conflict came, at the first call for troops, he marched away at the head of the Cahaba Rifles to offer his sword to the cause of the South. In many of the fiercest and bloodiest battles of the war General PETTUS displayed a quality of courage and a power of command that secured for him speedy promotion, and he rose to the rank of brigadier-general. As the leader of a forlorn charge his courage never wavered; in the deliberations of council of war his advice was ever marked by its wisdom; in the privations and hardships of a struggle that was growing rapidly more and more hopeless his devotion and his loyalty never faltered. Small wonder, then, that his people accorded to him a measure of love and devotion that has seldom been surpassed and that when the Grim Reaper should come there was not a fireside in Alabama that did not feel a personal loss.

The early life of Senator PETTUS was full of stirring incidents. As a soldier of two wars and a "forty-niner" he sought in these channels an outlet for the activity of a vigorous spirit. He was wont to say that his boyhood was inclined to be wild and rough. That he learned to curb this spirit and turn its activity into the channels of usefulness was due in great measure to the influence of the gentlewoman who for sixty years was his wife and companion—who bore with him every hardship and who took a gentle pride in the honors accorded him by a grateful people. Two characteristics stand out preeminent in the life of Senator PETTUS—his love and devotion to his family and his fidelity to his friends. Imbued with the spirit of chivalry, with a high ideal of honor, a lover of the truth, he was ever on the side of right and justice and the cause of the weak found in him a steadfast champion.

His life was strangely intertwined with that of his colleague whose death preceded his by a scant two months. We now recall with what solicitude he watched the failing strength of his life-long friend. From earliest boyhood in the little town of Cahaba, where they grew side by side into manhood, their lives flowed as twin currents until the discovery of gold in California drew the more adventurous spirit of Senator PETTUS. Returning after two years, they both gave their best efforts to the cause of the South, and after the war both settled in Selma, where the stream of their lives, broken once, was reunited and flowed thus without interruption for nearly half a century. In June of 1907 Senator PETTUS was called upon to follow the body of his friend to its last resting place. The current of their lives, thus rudely broken, seemed to foreshadow his own approaching end. Returning from the grave of his life-long companion, surrounded by his family and his friends, he spoke of death and, though apparently still vigorous, of his own approaching end. MORGAN was dead; he was soon to follow. He wanted no eulogies and no elaborate display when he should be laid to rest, but asked that the simple ceremonies of the Presbyterian Church should be read over him in his own home. And so it was. Scarcely yet had the flowers laid upon the tomb of his friend withered away, when the people of Alabama were called to pay the last tribute to this other "grand old man." Beneath the trees of beautiful Live Oak Cemetery they together sleep the sleep that knows no waking. As in life they stood, so in death they lie side by side, and to the memory of each the people of a grateful State and nation have given that measure of love and devotion which is the meed of a life well spent and a race well run.

Simple, straightforward, unassuming, unselfish to a degree, of rugged honesty and sincerity of purpose, and yet withal gentle as a woman, the life of Senator PETTUS breathes the spirit of the old South, of a régime that is rapidly passing away. Like a granite pillar chiseled from his own native quarries, his life rises before us, lofty and massive and yet withal graceful. With its base standing enshrouded in mist—the troubles and hardships of his early life—it rises in its grandeur above the clouds, the mists fall away, and sun-kissed it stands in the light of heaven, a monument of a glory that is past and a guide to that which is to be.

The potentates on whom men gaze,
When once their rule has reached its goal,
Die into darkness with their days.
But monarchs of the mind and soul,
With light unfailing and unspent
Illumine fame's firmament.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, MORGAN and PETTUS of Alabama were two of Plutarch's men. They were unique, distinctive, heroic, achieving, characterized by traits peculiarly their own. Their long lives were filled with efficient services of good citizenship in both civic and military life. They were a noble pair, supplements and complements of each other in the diversity of their talents and attainments, and yet alike in congruing temperament and in the devotion of their hearts and minds to the common good. As they were neighbors and friends of the town of Selma, in Alabama, so they were yokefellows in the Senate.

It was a pleasing spectacle to behold the mutual cooperation, deference, and confidence with which they performed their labors. No one could see them without recognizing in their personalities, which mark the expression of a people, that they were American men, and no one could know them without realizing that their Americanism was of that manly, broad, wholesome, and friendly type which communicated the instincts of freedom and fellowship. It was more than this. It was Americanism deeply rooted in the free institutions of the English-speaking people, that has builded upon them in our own Republic of many mansions the strongest, freest, and the most hopeful fabric of the world's history and aspiration.

Some day it is to be hoped the biographer will make faithful portraiture of the lives, the services, and the personal characteristics of these typical Americans. There would be found in them the graphic narrative of the great era in which they lived, and of the rare conditions and scenes of adventure, risk, hardship, trial, and tribulations through which they passed. It was not an era that can ever repeat itself, and although we are told that "The thing which hath been is the thing which shall be," it seems quite sure that while the philosophic truth may be preserved, in the current of nature it can never again assume the forms, shapes, and stirring incidents with which the past era of American history has been so deeply marked. Some features of that era were unprecedented in the world's history, and this country now knows itself too well to admit the thought of its recurrence.

As MORGAN and PETTUS were in life united, so in death they were but briefly divided, I will speak of them together. They were both my friends, whom I greatly honored and dearly loved.

They were independent men. That great virtue of manly independence was seen in their whole life course. I have never known in the Senate two men who possessed more of this pure and lofty quality.

Thy spirit, independence, let me share,
Lord of the lion heart and eagle eye—was the invocation which had been fully answered unto them.

When they had opinions it required no effort on their part to state them openly and fearlessly. Truth of sincere conviction was their abiding guide.

They were party men, such as are all of us in a Republic which is governed by party. Those who stay with party organizations because they believe that only through their unity and sympathy of action great and worthy ends can be accomplished have often to bow, for a time, at least, to both men and measures when they are not in thorough consonance with them. No doubt this was sometimes the lot of MORGAN and PETTUS, for it is the common lot and seems to be an inevitable feature of great political concerns; but none as a rule could be more scrupulous or consistent than they in hewing to the line of great fundamental principles upon which this Government was founded.

PETTUS, the older Senator, was born in Alabama in 1821. The common school and Clinton College, in Tennessee, were the avenues of his approach to education.

In that State MORGAN was born in 1824, but in youth he removed to Alabama, and there the lifelong friends alike entered the profession of the law—PETTUS in 1842 and MORGAN in 1845.

The spirit of adventure was alive in the breast of young PETTUS. He entered in the war with Mexico as a lieutenant, and in 1849 rode with the great stream of adventurers to the golden fields of California.

PETTUS was 75 years of age when he came to this Chamber. He brought with him the ripeness of his years, and the natural increasing disposition to dispense with things extraneous, remote or discursive. He was not a frequent speaker, but when he spoke he drove right ahead at the pith of the matter in a plain, common-sense fashion. His speeches were often illustrated by some apt adage, and quaint, mellow humor would now and then fix attention and attract concurrence when prosaic details would only weary.

Of the old Revolutionary Virginia stock—his grandfather, Anthony Winston, having served as a captain in the War of Independence—he preserved in his own character and career the marked ancestral traits.

MORGAN entered the Senate on the 4th of March, 1877, at the age of 55, a time astir with the last great commotions which were involved in the aftermath of war. From that time forth he took part in all the great debates in this Chamber and did efficient and successful work on many committees. He had great knowledge of foreign affairs, of Indian affairs, of the Constitution, of the laws, and of the literature of this country, and, indeed, of all questions that came before the Senate in his time. He read much. His memory was marvelous—"wax to receive and marble to retain." No matter what the subject was on which he fixed attention, he poured forth copiously the streams of his knowledge. His mind was so suggestive that he turned the subject in all lights and shades in which it could be regarded, and when he finished his speech a contribution had been made to the literature of the subject which would become the resort of all who desired to stir their own reflections or to inform themselves fully upon it. Nevertheless, when his mind was aroused by the sharpness of debate, he could be as salient as he could be philosophic, as witty or as humorous as he could be argumentative and instructive, and the flashes of his penetrative wisdom have often illumined and felicitated the Senate.

We can not think of MORGAN without thinking also of the isthmian canal, to which he devoted so many years of his life. No man in this country knew more on that subject than he did. No man more sedulously studied or more fully expounded it. None more thoroughly believed in the good it would bring to America and to mankind. As Maury was to the science of the ocean tides and currents and to the courses of the merchantmen that cover the oceans, so MORGAN was to the isthmian canal that will unite them.

That his great work did not eventuate through the particular plan which he commended was a deep disappointment to him, but he took up the plan which others preferred, and with loyal spirit continued to the end in view with irrepressible and unabated spirit.

Neither can we think of PETTUS without remembering his last good-natured and successful plea to the Senate to remove a relic of civil strife that remained as a bar to the recovery of certain claims in which the South is interested. Its aptness quelled opposition.

MORGAN was of a slenderer build than PETTUS, of manly and graceful bearing, his form crowned with a noble head and dome-like brow, and with fine features which suggested to the mind the lawyer, the statesman, the judge, and the senator.

PETTUS was a stalwart. His commanding figure was a pillar of power. His was a tall, stout, well-knit frame, large limbed and well proportioned. His figure intimated the soldier who rode with the Ironsides and would cleave with the broadsword in battle. A powerful brain filled his massive, Websterian head, and his strong features, beaming with benign intelligence, had that noble expression of the St. Bernard dog which bespeaks alike courage and generosity.

Both of these men were soldiers. MORGAN started in the war of 1861 as a private, becoming first major and then lieutenant-colonel in the Fifth Alabama Infantry, under Col. Robert E. Rodes, afterwards the brilliant major-general of the Confederacy, who fell in the desperate battle of Winchester.

PETTUS about the same time entered the Twentieth Alabama Infantry as a major, became its lieutenant-colonel, and subsequently a brigadier-general for deeds of great daring in actual conflict upon the field.

MORGAN, after creditable service in the first great battle of the war at Bull Run, and afterwards in others, rose to a similar distinction, and in whatever line of vocation they appeared they showed that they were born leaders of men. They were borne to the front by moral and intellectual gravitation, just as surely as natural gravitation moves the world and the planets.

They were both lawyers; lawyers of learning and of manifold abilities; of assiduous application and successful practice; well equipped and well capable to dispute with the first foemen of the bar; indefatigable workers, patient, but bold, and conscientious advocates, each an honor to his profession.

MORGAN loved the lore of the law, traversed its broad fields, explored its recesses and found delight in its philosophies.

PETTUS delighted more in the rugged maxims hewn from life, although he was lacking in nothing of reading or of reflection that furnishes the good lawyer with his armor or enables him to do his part in the lists of controversy before the bench or before the jury.

They were domestic men. To our race the home is the capital. As it will have peace if it have to fight for it, it will have a home though it have to wander over the seas, mountains, and deserts to build it.

The home was to them the first consideration, and in their homes they were the revered fathers and heads of families. They were husbands who found under their roofs the sacred and enchanted castle that held and guarded their treasures. There the charms of life solaced and rewarded their labors. There they found that happiness which may be sought through the boiling waves of ocean, by the midnight lamp, or through the tempest of the battle, but which can only be found 'mid the quiet scenes where love wields its scepter.

They were orators who could stir men's blood; debaters who could hold their ground in any intellectual conflict; fellow-men who could do the man's part in council, field, or forum; notable specimens of those who can write, speak, and fight; but above all they were peacemakers—never fomenters of strife between neighbors, between races, or between sections.

They were patriots. In the unhappy times of sectional aberration and alienation they were true to what they were and to what their people were; and men thus true to themselves could not possibly be false to any cause or to any man. When their country was cemented in the whole unbroken nation by the blood and sacrifices of the brave who fought on each side, they dedicated to it their faithful service. They had nothing in common with the worm that bites itself in the dust; they accepted and they did the best they could with what had come to pass. "God decides; let that suffice." These golden words of Robert E. Lee were their intimate thoughts. They loved the whole country and all its people, and nothing human was alien to their hearts. Out of that love flowed their service, and in that service all men knew that they "bore" each for himself "without reproach the grand old name of gentleman." As they honored all, so in the equity of nature all honored them.

They had civic courage, a rarer virtue than that of the sea or the field of battle. They did not ask, "Is this the popular side of the question?" but only, "Is this the right side?" Those questions answered to their conscience and fixed their course. Men who quail not before a serried hostile line or an imminent deadly breach often quail before an opposing multitude. But MORGAN and PETTUS did not quail, but went their own gait wheresoever duty led them.

They were statesmen—statesmen in a very high, a very useful, and a very efficient sense; old-fashioned American statesmen, deeply imbued with the teachings of history and warned by them of the rocks on which nations have been shattered—statesmen not only in studious and penetrating reflection upon the conditions of the country, but upon the questions of foreign policy it has to deal with; statesmen in knowledge of its multifarious and varigated interests; statesmen of the conserving good sense which must be employed to keep in conciliation and in common spirit the immense masses of widespread regions, differing in climates, productions, and in all natural features, whether of field, or forest, or desert, or mine, or river, or lonely wilderness, or crowded city; statesmen, too, knowing the complexity of racial and industrial problems which are before a people consisting of the old-time populations of colonial stock, side by side, with the vast inpourings of immigration from all corners of the globe.

To hold such an immense mass in the balances of well-adjusted laws and to transfuse it into a homogeneous whole is a stupendous thing to contemplate, and it is the marvel of the world that so far our unprecedented and unmatched Constitution has availed to preserve our inheritance and to keep alive here the hope and faith that the future may prove worthy of the past. A greater people have never yet appeared upon this globe than the Americans, and it must solemnize any just mind to realize the responsibility which comes to it with the injunction to take heed that no ill befall the Republic.

Statesmanship is sometimes exemplified by great measures, but most great measures are the products of many minds, crystallized into expression by the few and perhaps associated with the name of one who presented them but took little part in their molding. As an instance I may cite the misnamed Sherman law. Senator John Sherman proposed a bill for which Senator Hoar offered a substitute which was adopted. Mr. Hoar humorously remarks in his memoirs, "It was so called (Sherman law) for no other reason that I can think of, except that Mr. Sherman had nothing to do with framing it." But the statesman, like the good citizen who constantly instills by good example as well as by precept the great stable and fundamental doctrines which conjure moderation of conduct and fidelity to principle and through them confirm confidence and make peace, renders a service to his country and to mankind which can not be overestimated.

PETTUS and MORGAN rendered such a service not only to their people at home, but to the whole country, and they constantly worked for their country with the hope and aspiration—

> That her fair form may stand and shine,
> Make bright our days and light our dreams,
> Putting to shame with light divine
> The falsehood of extremes.

They were never trimmers. They stood four square to all the winds that blow, and in their State they were as patriarchs in Israel.

They were not money lovers or money seekers. They were not hustlers, rushing hither and thither to get ahead of anybody else or to get unto themselves hasty riches. They had time to do everything that was for them to do, but no time to waste for the frail, flitting, and adventitious things upon which many set great store. Like the princes of their race, "I serve" was the watchword of their instinct and ambition, and so faithfully did they serve that those served by them felt so safe in their hands that they never questioned their servants, but were proud to serve in turn the things they aimed at, which were their country, God, and truth.

The tender and forceful speech in which PETTUS—when advocating increase of salary—depicted the life of MORGAN, its possibilities and its renunciation of riches for public service, made deep impression on all who heard it.

Tears do not become the memory of MORGAN and PETTUS. Mourning is not the badge which we should wear for them. Rather bring the flowers of rejoicing tribute that they did so many things so well and that they acquitted themselves like men. The country has sent back their bodies and consigned them to rest amongst the loyal hearts of the people of Alabama, whom they loved and whom they served so well. But above the ceremonious tributes of State rises the high honor of a whole people for patriots who were true to every loyal instinct and affection. Length of days had been given them. Their strength endured until the sun hung low in the western sky. Then their work was done. At evening's close their hour had come. "Well done, good and faithful servants," was the parting salutation of all who worked with them and of all for whom they had worked. And so they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, when a man dies in youth or in his prime with years of usefulness before him, the sentiment is grief or despair. Every year which one enjoys in health and the full possession of all his faculties beyond the Psalmist's limit of life is a source of gratitude. If he is still at fourscore in the forefront of the battle when the summons comes, the event elicits reminiscence, record and applause.

Alabama, through her two venerable and great Senators, MORGAN and PETTUS, had in this body a unique distinction. These two representatives, or as they might be called, ambassadors of a sovereign State, one 83 and the other 86, and by reason of their ability and power destined to reelection which would carry them both toward their century, present a picture which has no parallel in our history. Senator MORGAN was in the front rank of the statesmen of the Republic. His great ability, vast acquirements, profound erudition, indomitable industry, self-sacrificing devotion to the public welfare and rare elequence have placed him in a niche of the temple of American fame. He possessed an almost unequaled command of English pure and undefiled, and in giving utterance to his thought it was done with such correct expression that after a running debate in which he took a principal part and which would last a day, his sentences were so perfect that his speech required neither review nor correction. More than any other of our statesmen he resembled the great English writer and orator, Edmund Burke. His colleague, Senator PETTUS, was a good lawyer and an able judge, but preeminently, in all his characteristics, the soldier. The friendship and interdependence of these associate representatives of Alabama upon each other and their daily intercourse was one of the most interesting and attractive pictures in the Senate. The General followed with awe and admiration the lead of the veteran and distinguished Senator, and the slender and fragile Senator seemed to lean with reverential regard upon the vigorous, aggressive and gigantic General, but at the moment when their State seemed unanimously resolved to keep them here without limit as to time the summons came to both, and they died as they had lived, neighbors and friends, possessing to the last the full vigor of their physical and mental powers.

Such an event inspires many reflections upon youth and age. The tribute of the world is given wholly to youth. Its admiration is for early achievement. It is apt to dismiss age or be impatient that it lingers upon the stage. I remember a distinguished English statesman remarking to me with disappointment and disgust after Mr. Gladstone's Midlothian campaign had electrified the country, "There is no use waiting for old men to die. After seventy they go on forever." The brightest pages of history, the most brilliant passages in oratory and the highest flights of rhetorical expression are devoted to the achievements of precocious genius. In our day everything is subjected to the merciless analysis of science and research. The most valued traditions of childhood are shattered by the cold processes of historical delving. William Tell becomes a myth and Arnold Winkelreid an exaggerated tradition. By the same bloodless dissection alienists and physiologists are now endeavoring to prove that in the formation and growth of the brain an unnatural and unhealthy early development tends either to degeneracy or, in rare instances, where there is great natural power, to extraordinary and morbid maturity in infancy and youth. It is the inspiration and despair of the schools that Alexander the Great was a wise ruler at 18 and conquered all Greece at 20. At 26 he wept because there were no more worlds to conquer and died at 30. His achievements and his tragic death were alike due to an abnormal brain which made him meet the characterization of Pope, "The youth who all things but himself subdued." In this he stands in marked contrast with Cæsar, who matured more slowly and naturally, and was at the zenith of his powers when assassinated at 56, and of whom Pope also said, "Cæsar was the world's great master and his own." Hannibal was in sight of the fulfillment of the vow to his father of the destruction of Rome when he was 31, but then his genius seemed to decay. Napoleon had reached the zenith of his powers at 35 and at Waterloo was the victim of premature senility. Byron's genius began to fade in his early thirties, and he died before he was 40. Pitt was prime minister at 25, and the maturity of his gifts was under 40. Goethe, the great German genius, and one of the greatest the world ever saw, on the other hand, grew normally to maturity and was no exception to nature's laws. The work which gave him universal recognition, "Iphigenia," was written when he was 37, but his immortality is largely based upon "Faust," which was published when he was 55. He lived without any abatement of mind until he was 83. Thiers, having accomplished a world of literary work and done much political service, saved France from total dismemberment at 71 and remained three years after in the presidency to consolidate his work. Von Moltke at 71 had become one of the most famous generals of the centuries, while Bismarck late in life consolidated the German people into one Empire under the great sovereign who wielded the scepter vigorously until past 90. Gladstone's most triumphant campaign, and one of the most remarkable in English history, was won by a stumping tour of unequaled vigor and versatility when he was 84. The dead line of 50, which had been the rule of the past, no longer exists in our day. Shakespeare divided life into seven ages.

At first the infant,
Mewling and puking in the nurse's arms.
Then the whining school-boy, with his satchel
And shining morning face, creeping like snail
Unwillingly to school. And then the lover,
Sighing like furnace, with a woeful ballad
Made to his mistress' eyebrow. Then a soldier,
Full of strange oaths, and bearded like the pard,
Jealous in honour, sudden, and quick in quarrel,
Seeking the bubble reputation
Even in the cannon's mouth. And then the Justice,
In fair round belly with good capon lin'd,
With eyes severe and beard of formal cut,
Full of wise saws and modern instances;
So he plays his part. The sixth age shifts
Into the lean and slipper'd pantaloon,
With spectacles on nose and pouch on side,
His youthful hose, well sav'd, a world too wide
For his shrunk shank; and his big manly voice,
Turning again toward childish treble, pipes
And whistles in his sound. Last scene of all,
That ends this strange, eventful history,
Is second childishness and mere oblivion,
Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything.

But Shakespeare died at 50.

Mr. President, we have only to look about this Senate to note the marvelous difference between Shakespeare's period and our own. It was then the survival of the fittest who possessed the vigor of constitution and strength which could resist the pestilence, plague, and disease common to the unsanitary conditions of the home, uncleanliness of the person, and wild excesses and intemperance of the times. According to Shakespeare's view, "the lean and slipper'd pantaloon" came between 50 and 60, and second childhood, "Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything," between 60 and 70. But in our day the leaders in the professions, the captains of industry, and the controlling minds in public life are largely those who look with equanimity upon three score and ten.

The life of Senator PETTUS is one of those American careers which are the perennial inspirations of our youth. Equipped with a vigorous constitution and a good education as his only capital, he began the battle of life with an optimistic cheerfulness and indomitable perseverance which were his characteristics for the succeeding sixty-five years. He was admitted to the bar in 1842, and was in the active practice of his profession, except when on the bench or in wars, for sixty-four years. He early won the favor of a large constituency, and two years after his admission to the bar, at the age of 23, was elected solicitor for the seventh circuit of Alabama. Heredity is either the curse or the blessing of us all. The dominant characteristic in the blood may skip several generations to ultimately assert itself with double force. It was the grandfather, who was a soldier of the Revolution, whose militant and virile spirit was reincarnated in his grandson. The call to arms in the Mexican war drew him instantly from the brilliant career upon which he had entered in legal and political life and he marched to Mexico as a lieutenant of an Alabama company. The stirring experiences of that campaign, with its battles and marches, its assaults and victories, were exquisite happiness to the young and enthusiastic soldier.

He returned from the war at the time when the country was excited, as it had never been before, by the gold discoveries in California. The romance and perils of the West appealed overwhelmingly to this adventurous spirit. That he did not have the money for this expensive trip was no obstacle to a man to whom obstacles were invitations. He started on horseback and found his way across the Great Plains of the West when its trails were infested by bands of hostile Indians. When he arrived the situation did not interest him. His was not the nature to endure hardships and the wild life of a mining camp of that period simply for gold. Glory was his ambition, gold only of value so far as it might help him to attain that end. The voyages and marches of the Forty-niners are a picturesque chapter in the story of the settlement and development of our Territories. They were practical Argonauts, whose search had its reward for some in fortunes greater than were possible to the seekers of the Golden Fleece, but for most of them bitter disappointment and unmarked graves. The sordid side of these early struggles on the golden coast repelled this chivalric knight and we find him soon returned to renewed activities at the bar and in the public life of his State. He had been brought up in the strictest school of State rights. The resolutions of 1789 were his political gospel and John C. Calhoun his political guide. One of his last acts in the Senate was to vote against the railroad rate bill, notwithstanding the public sentiment in its favor, because he believed that it violated in principle his fundamental beliefs in the rights and sovereignty of the States. He was among the earliest to enlist for the war in the Confederate army, and believed as thoroughly in the righteousness of his cause as did his patriot grandfather in that of the Revolution.

His commanding figure made him an ideal soldier. He was elected a major of his regiment, but his gallantry upon many bloody battlefields soon won him the stars of a brigadier-general. His impetuosity and daring made him a prisoner of war, but he received the consideration of his captors which gallant soldiers always pay to heroic enemies against whom have gone the fortunes of the fight. The civil war ended, he again resumed the activities of peace. Having vigorously and conscientiously done the work of his laborious profession and accepted many honors from his fellow-citizens, he thought that at 75 he would like to retire to the dignity and congenial duties of a Federal judge, with its permanency of office, securing the pleasures of comfortable and serene old age, but the political powers of his State hurt his pride and aroused his spirit by informing him that he was too old. This stirred the soldier to conflict, and with the answer, "If I am too old to be a judge, I am young enough to be a United States Senator," he entered a contest before the people for the place. He broke down all opposition, and overthrowing the leaders of his party captured the imagination and support of the people, and at 76 was triumphantly elected Senator of the United States from the State of Alabama. When the time for his reelection came, he was 83 years of age, but there was no opposition, and his triumph was complete. It was one of his most gratifying recollections that his second election cost only $1, the legal fee for his certificate. He was reelected at the end of his second for a third term, which, if he had lived, would have carried him to the age of 95. There is no such record in the whole history of the Senate.

I served with him on the Committee on the Judiciary. He never missed a meeting, and his reports upon the questions referred to him as a subcommittee were not only able and judicial, but possessed a picturesque originality and humor which gave them the flavor of that Elizabethan literature of which he had been all his life an ardent student. His humor was resistless, and we all remember the occasions when the driest debate was suddenly lifted into life and his side enormously helped by the ripple of laughter which disturbed this august assemblage at one of his sallies. As impregnable were his opinions, so unshakable were his friendships, and he would make any sacrifice to aid or defend those whom he loved.

Side by side in the old churchyard in the village of Selma lie these great statesmen of Alabama, not of Alabama alone, but of the United States. As the years go by that will become sacred ground and a mecca for the youth of the South who would get inspiration for great careers in the civil or military life of their country. The Senators who were privileged to serve with MORGAN and PETTUS unite in paying to their memories the deepest and tenderest tributes of respect and admiration. Long after we are gone, among the cherished traditions of this body will be the recollection of the lives, the genius, the work, and the picturesque personality and originality of these historical figures fighting back death and serving their country when past four-score years, and dying, as they had lived, together.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, but for the invitation of the Senator from Alabama, the successor of him to whose memory we are here paying tribute, I should have remained quiet and listened to those older in the service and better acquainted with our late distinguished friend and colleague.

It is certainly very proper that the Senate should lay aside its work and devote this hour to the life and memory of one who was so long one of its most important members and who honored this body and the country he served so much as did the late Senator MORGAN. It is, however, more appropriate that those who served with him longer and knew him better should occupy most of the time, and therefore I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate but a moment.

The parting with friends at death is always sad. The ties of friendship and affection are broken, and those who are left are deprived of a sweet companionship and beloved association. But in this case the loss is more than personal, for the country has lost one of its most devoted public servants. Senator MORGAN's public life was so long and his service in this body of such an unusually high character that I can well understand the great sorrow that has been shown by those of his former associates who have already spoken. I have been very deeply impressed by what has been said, and as I have listened to the words of others it has seemed to me that, after all, life is worth living if it is lived rightly, and that a man's work is properly measured and appreciated. The words that have been uttered to-day are not only tokens of the esteem in which he was held by those who knew him so long and so well, but they are monuments imperishable and everlasting to the honesty, the courage, the energy, and the devotion of our late colleague to the great public service that he made his life work.

In the rush and hurry of life there is not always opportunity and perhaps there is not always inclination to recognize properly the worth of men, but it is when the trials are passed and the books are closed that the proper and everlasting estimate of a man is made. I have no doubt that there have come to our deceased friend times of disappointment, times of discouragement, and times when he would have given the richest things that he had to have been assured of the appreciation of his fellow-men that has been expressed here to-day. It has been no fulsome praise; it has been the expression of genuine appreciation of men most competent to judge. There may be erected to his memory monuments of marble and bronze. They will keep his name fresh in the memory of men, but these remarks to-day tell, as the cold stone can never tell, of the things for which he was loved and that made him great in the estimate of mankind. There is no reward equal to the respect of one's fellow-men. It is a reward that may always be had, yet one that is not always had. It is a reward that must be earned, and happy indeed is he who gains it and few are there who gain it in the degree and the measure, so universally and with so many people as did the late Senator. Men may inherit riches, they may buy the gaudy things of life, and temporary honors may at times be theirs by accident, but the undying affection and respect of men comes neither by inheritance, by purchase, nor by chance. It is truly a reward of merit.

The life of such a man is an encouragement to everyone who knows of it. As I have heard from the lips of Senators here to-day the splendid tributes to the noble life of Senator MORGAN, I have thought what an inspiration to right living and faithful performance of duty, and that although he is dead, still those traits of character and manliness are living on, as they shall ever continue to live in the life and in the work of succeeding generations. For thirty years he had been a member of this great body. For more than half a century he had devoted himself to public duty, and there is no stain upon his garments nor any reproach upon his memory. He honored himself, the work that he was engaged in, and the country he served. The story of his life is a part of the history of his country. The one can not be written without involving the other.

As a student of history I knew him long before I had ever met him personally. I knew his sturdiness of character, his manliness of action long before I came in personal contact with him, and one of the things that I looked forward to most fondly in coming to Washington and entering public life was the opportunity of meeting him and others of his distinguished colleagues, of whom I had read so much. I entered this body the youngest member, and he was among its older members. Our service together was not long, and accordingly it was not given to me to become personally well acquainted with him, but I can here testify to a generous and courteous treatment at his hands. I found him gracious and always ready to extend a helping hand and to encourage and direct a beginner along the paths that he knew so well.

Of course I did not know those little personal traits that endeared him to those of you who knew him well, nor did I come in close enough contact with him to overcome the veneration and awe that comes to us of those that we have known so long at a distance and to whom we have learned to look for guidance and inspiration. But, sirs, I did know him as one of the truly great men of his time, and loved and respected him as one of the most distinguished of public men. No man was ever more devoted to public duty than he and none more tireless and energetic in his work. And though the years crept on and weakened his body, yet his energy was unflagging. His mind, a storehouse of information, was drawn upon to the last in the service of his country, and what he had gained by his years of study and service he used, even unto the end, with the same courage and sincerity of purpose that had characterized his long and busy life. His death was a distinct loss to the country. We could ill afford to lose him, and yet, if measured in amount of work done or success achieved, we can truly say his work was ended and he was entitled to that rest to which all men must go. He lived at a time when there was great work to be done, and he helped to perform the greatest work that it has ever been given any man to do. No government has ever been so successful as the United States has been during the last fifty years. No country has ever made the material progress; human liberty has never attained the high standard, and the people have never attained the opportunities anywhere in the world's history that they have during those fifty years.

It was given to him to see the States double in number, the population increase threefold, and the wealth of the country increase a hundredfold. He saw an expansion of trade and commerce in the comparatively few years of his life such as had never been dreamed of before in the six thousand years of the world's history. He saw the production of steel increase from 16,000 tons to 16,000,000 tons. He saw the railroad mileage develop from nothing to more than 200,000 miles. He saw the nation rise from insignificance to a world power, and to it all contributed of his energy and his work.

The men of his generation who have had their hand on the pilot wheel of this Republic will be more appreciated as time goes by, and I can not see them passing from us without a deeper sensibility and realization of the responsibility of those of us younger in years and upon whom must devolve the burdens that these older men have so patriotically and so successfully borne. And fortunate, indeed, shall we be if their successors shall be able to carry onward and upward the work and the glory of the Republic as these men have in the past.

Every generation has its own problems, and every man has his duty to perform. Human and frail as we are, we are liable to think that all good begins with us and that all good will end with our generation. We forget that our great responsibilities are the achievements of our predecessors. If greater problems confront us than ever before, it is because greater men lived last generation than ever before. But, sirs, whatever the future may have in store, into whosesoever hands the guidance of public affairs may come, we shall be fortunate indeed if the work shall be performed as successfully and well as it has been done by those men who have directed our course for the last thirty or forty years. I speak as one of a younger generation, acknowledging a debt of gratitude to a preceding generation and as one who fervently prays that their example may be an inspiration and a guiding star in the work of this generation.

I can not add more to what has been said of his work and merit, and in closing will only add he lived long, he worked hard, and the world is better because he lived. He performed his duty well and was a useful man to society in the day and generation that he lived, and his reward will be the undying affection of all the generations that shall come after him.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I want to express the regret of my colleague and myself that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] was prevented by sickness from paying a tribute to the late Senator PETTUS.

I want also to thank, in the name of all the people of Alabama, the Senators on both sides who have spoken so eloquently and so affectionately of the dead Senators from Alabama.

Mr. President, I move that as a further mark of respect the Senate adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to, and (at 3 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 20, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 18, 1908.

[Continuation of the legislative day of Monday, April 6, 1908.]

The recess having expired, the House, at 11.30 a. m., was called to order by the Speaker.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SIMS. For a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to ask if it is in order at this time to move to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 4063, with Senate amendments, and move to concur in the same?

The SPEAKER. A privileged motion is pending that the House do resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, which is a motion of very high privilege. Until that motion is disposed of it will not be in order.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 50, noes 25.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the vote, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The ayes are 50, and the noes are 25.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, at the same time I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absentees; as many as are in favor of the motion will, when their names are called, answer "yea;" as many as are opposed will answer "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 221, nays 5, answered "present" 13, not voting 148, as follows:

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20345, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NICHOLLS] for twenty minutes.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to read to the committee a resolution adopted by the annual convention of the United Mine Workers of America, indorsing the Pearre anti-injunction bill, and to speak for a short time upon the subject.

The special committee on injunctions reported the following preamble and resolutions to the nineteenth annual convention of the United Mine Workers of America, which were unanimously adopted:

We, your committee on government by injunction, after a thorough investigation of the subject, beg leave to submit the following for your careful consideration:

"There is no one right for which the English-speaking people of the world have contended with greater zeal than that of trial by jury in all cases where alleged violations of the law have taken place and the life, liberty, or property of any citizen has been involved.

"The peace of Wedmore, concluded between Alfred the Great and Guthram the Dane, in the year 878 A. D., provided that 'If a king's thane be charged with killing a man, if he dares to clear himself, let him do it before twelve king's thanes.' The Magna Charta of Great Britain, wrested from King John because of the arbitrary methods of his judicial agents, declared that 'No freeman shall be taken or imprisoned or disseized or outlawed or banished or in any way destroyed, nor will we pass upon him, nor will we send upon him unless by the judgment of his peers.' The Declaration of Independence gives as one of the causes of the separation from the mother country 'for depriving us in many cases of the benefit of trial by jury.' The Constitution of the United States and of the several States guarantees this right. Many wars have been waged, innumerable laws have been passed, judges have been impeached and deposed in order to maintain this sacred right which has long been recognized as one of the principal pillars in the structure of human liberty.

"This course has been made necessary because experience has demonstrated that judges are but human and prone to human errors, and while many of them may hear and determine such cases as come before them with conscientious care, there are those who do not hesitate to stretch, or even break, the law in their eagerness to promote the interest of those who are in a position to assist them in securing wealth, power, or notoriety.

"All men are more or less influenced by their associations. Judges are like other men. They are moved by the same feelings, prejudices, or passions that influence ordinary citizens. Their associates are men of wealth and their social circle is one that few workingmen enter. Their discussions of economical and industrial questions are almost invariably with the rich and affluent, who view the whole field of human effort from the standpoint of an employer. Judges would be more than human if they did not gradually, even though unconsciously, become tainted with the ideas of some of the employing classes which are so widely at variance with the standards of right and equity revered by millions of those who toil. With a knowledge of these facts wage-workers would be false to themselves, their families, and republican institutions if they failed to protest, with all the vigor and power they possess, against any system of jurisprudence that can deprive a citizen of his liberty or property without the facts in his case having first been determined by a jury of his peers.

"The broad scope that has recently been given to injunctions in labor disputes places an unlimited power in the hands of one man, and it makes no difference whether you call that man a czar or a judge, the result is the same. If he has a right to restrain a thousand men, the same right would apply to a million. If he can by law restrain a portion of the people, he can by the same law restrain the remainder, and thus make himself dictator. Those who have not felt the heavy hand of this despotic system may feel secure in the enjoyment of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," but it is a false security. The power that can break the Constitution to crush the employees of a coal king or a railroad magnate—that can restrain the competitors of a trust or a syndicate—can destroy the business and curtail the liberties of any citizen whenever it suits the purpose of that power to do so.

"Injunctions are not a modern innovation in the jurisprudence of the world, although their use in labor disputes is of very recent introduction. They can be traced into the remote past, and have been handed down to us from the days of absolute despotism, when the monarch, combining in his own person the legislative, judicial, and executive branches of government, issued his edict, personally or through his judicial agents, restraining persons from doing those things which were obnoxious to him.

"In the early English practice, from which our system was derived, the court in chancery had the sole privilege of issuing injunctions, but it was only exercised in those cases where the property of the plaintiff was threatened with damage for which the statute or common law provided no adequate remedy. Upon this claim of the English courts our State and Federal judiciaries base their power to issue injunctions.

"Injunctions in labor disputes are usually granted against violent or unlawful acts, for which the State or common law provides ample remedy, and is a clear violation of the right of trial by jury. They go far beyond the point of protecting the property interests of the plaintiff, and deny to the members of the trade union that has been restrained, their constitutional right of public assemblage. They prevent us from going upon our own property to hold meetings, because it may happen to be near to, or within sight of, the property of our employers, although it would be difficult to imagine how it would be possible for us to own any property that is not adjacent to some other property. They deny us the right to talk to our fellow-citizens and endeavor to persuade them to cease working for the plaintiff, and injunctions embodying these orders are granted because it is alleged that if meetings are held and the employees are induced to cease work the property of the employer will be injured beyond any legal means of redress. That their property is entitled to the same protection that the property of other citizens receives can not be denied, but when an injunction is issued restraining the members of a union from in any manner interfering with an employee, it carries with it the assumption on the part of the court that the employer seeking the order has a property interest in his employees, an assumption absolutely contrary to the letter of our Constitution and the spirit of our laws.

"The only objects attained by their issue is to embarrass the wage-workers in their efforts to secure higher wages and better conditions of employment and to take out of the hands of a jury the right to hear and determine the facts in any case of violation, or alleged violation, of law.

"The trade unionists of our country never have and do not now ask for any immunity from the requirements of the law. We are now and ever have been defenders of law and order. We ask no special privileges at the hands of our Government. We seek only to secure for ourselves the same rights that are accorded to other citizens of our land, and we will not cease this agitation while the power remains in the hands of any one person, be he judge or layman, to issue an injunction revoking our constitutional rights to publicly assemble and freely discuss our grievances [applause] and to deprive us of our liberty or property without the fact of our guilt having first been determined by a jury of our peers.

"If the liberties of the American people are to be maintained; if we are to perpetuate a 'government of the people, for the people, and by the people;' if we would prevent a moneyed oligarchy from usurping the rights of the Republic, the power to issue and enforce injunctions in labor disputes must be taken from the courts. Persons must be punished for the crimes they have committed when a jury of their peers has determined their guilt, and under no pretense must they be deprived of liberty or property through the judgment, malignity, self-interest, or caprice of any one man.

"If we desire relief from this condition that has grown upon us, we must act in concert. We must first understand our needs and put into effect the necessary machinery to get relief. We have nearly one-half million voters directly engaged in mining in the United States, who are distributed throughout the country in such proportion that we may determine the composition of Congress, and when we remember this fact we realize that if we do not secure remedial legislation, the fault is our own. If we expect to secure relief, every laboring man must act, not by denouncing the courts or those who issue injunctions, but to demand of our Representatives in Congress to know where they stand with reference to the growing evil of government by injunction.

"The American Federation of Labor has indorsed the Pearre bill intending to remedy this wrong. No measure can be more important than one necessary to protect the rights and liberties of the people. We, therefore, recommend the indorsement of the Pearre bill without amendments of any kind, and urge that every official and member of our organization write personal letters to their Congressmen and Senators urging the passage of this bill immediately.

"We recommend that the United Mine Workers' of America cooperate with any and all other organizations that may desire to cooperate with us in securing the passage of this measure, and we therefore recommend that the international officials be instructed to communicate with every national and international trade organization, urging them to take similar action.

"Respectfully submitted.

"Attest:
"W. B. WILSON."

In reading over the statement of Mr. D. W. Dillon, of Fayetteville, W. Va., representing the New River coal operators before the House Committee on Judiciary in 1904, I selected a few passages which seem important in this great question, inasmuch as they indicate the opinion that the coal operators have as to the rights of individuals upon the bench as against those who are in private life.

In answer as to whether any person who is accused of violating an injunction order ought to be entitled to a trial by jury, Mr. Dillon said:

I do not know.

When pressed for an opinion later on he said:

My own opinion is that he is not entitled to it and should not be entitled to it.

Replying to this question:

If injunctions have issued by Federal judges which restrains workmen from doing lawful things, do you think Congress should legislate to prevent such injunctions from being issued in the future?

Mr. Dillon said:

No, sir; I do not think Congress should do it.

Then admitted that—

It is not unusual that a court issuing a temporary injunction order may get language in it that it ought not to put in it.

Continuing further, he said:

I want to say in answer to one question that was propounded, whether or not in my opinion, a violator of an injunction order was entitled to a trial by jury, I do not think so, for the reason that I think the court has the right of self-defense, to protect its own orders; and it is the right of every court that the orders of that court are subjects of review by that court alone, and that the court would determine whether or not the order had been violated.

Now, gentlemen, it does not seem to be fair play, nor good policy even, for our judges to be allowed such unlimited powers, as to make it possible for them to do wrong by issuing injunctions forbidding persons to do certain things which they have a right to do, and then to be permitted to maintain their own wrongdoing by penalty or imprisonment, without appeal, review, or a trial being allowed the accused person.

Having broken the law by issuing a certain form of injunction, it does not seem equitable that the same judge should be allowed to punish such persons as refuse to be wronged by him.

Our fundamental laws do not, I understand, contemplate giving authority to a judge or any other person to make laws, define the meaning of laws, and execute them. Yet in these cases we have lawmaker and judge combined in one person.

After admitting that "it is not unusual that a court issuing a temporary injunction order may get language in it that it ought not put in it." It sounds ridiculous and unfair to read his other statement that "The court has the right of self-defense," but that the poor man who has been injured, and who has violated the unjust order, shall not have the right of self-defense, namely, a trial by jury—some one to judge between him and the possibly unjust judge. It is equal to allowing a criminal to constitute himself the law, and declare a certain criminal act legal, then judge himself as to whether or not he had committed a crime. Then, finding from an examination that the wrong he had committed had been declared by himself to be no crime, he decides, as judge, that he is not guilty. Finally he proceeds to have brought before him such persons as may have declared by words or deeds that his act was wrong and to punish them summarily.

The power of judges to issue injunctions in any matter which they see fit and in any manner they please should be taken away from them in the interest of the people's safety and liberty.

There has been sufficient experience had by the employers with strikes and the matters attending them, to enable them to ask for such laws as will give them proper protection.

If they honestly desire only to be protected in their rights, as equals with other citizens, they would seek such legislation as would secure them in this and would not insist upon expanding the powers of judges to the extent of making them dictators.

In my opinion, the workingmen of the nation will not long tolerate the present conditions of affairs. They will take a greater interest in politics and will support such representatives for legislative positions as will represent their ideas in the important questions concerning them. [Applause.]

With a few others, I have been sent here to protest against the refusal of Congress to enact such legislation as will, by statute, deprive the courts of the powers which they have arbitrarily arrogated to themselves.

It has been suggested by friends who believe an evil exists and that something ought to be done, that a hearing be given before a temporary injunction be issued.

Why should we hesitate to take away from any person the power to enact laws, declare certain persons to be in violation of the same, and to punish them at his pleasure? Then, again, even after a hearing, in which the injustice of the application for an injunction has been shown, the judge still has the unrestricted power to issue it regardless of the facts. Are there unjust men? May there not be unjust judges?

Another phase to be considered is that the persons against whom a restraining order is applied for are usually poor working people, who are not able financially to employ an attorney to go into court to argue against the issuance of a temporary injunction, or against it being later on made permanent. If the case is not fought by those enjoined, the injunction will likely be made permanent.

There will be no use in going before the people during the coming campaign to tell them how much we love them and how much we are going to do for them. They want an earnest of our intentions now. Let us pass upon, in this House and in the Senate, the measures which are desired by the people now. Then the people will believe our protestations of great interest in their welfare. I hope when the committee rises some one who can get recognition for that purpose will ask consent for the discharge of the Committee on the Judiciary from further consideration of the Pearre anti-injunction bill and that it be considered in the House.

This question is of too great importance to be settled finally by a committee. Let the House discuss it and go on record in the case. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NICHOLLS. May I be permitted one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. General debate on that side of the House has been exhausted.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by the House before going into Committee of the Whole, as equally divided, has been exhausted on that side of the Chamber. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for twelve minutes.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert these last few lines in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as there was no objection to the extension of the gentleman's remarks in the RECORD, I wish to ask if it will be in order now to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] may be permitted to extend the remarks they made a few days ago in the RECORD?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to ask.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that leave be granted to those two gentlemen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, in keeping with a certain policy which I announced, I am compelled to object to requests for unanimous consent on that side of the Chamber.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few observations upon the general subject of the provision that this country makes for the maintenance of our diplomatic and consular service. Especially I desire to again call attention to a condition which this bill does not go far to ameliorate, a condition under which some of our highest offices have ceased to be the reward of merit and of fitness and are now the reward practically for wealth alone. That such a condition should exist in any country, even in a czar-governed country, would be bad enough, but in a republic, and especially in this Republic, the most democratic that has ever existed, it is lamentable in the extreme. And yet this is the condition under our present system, and I repeat that it is utterly unrepublican, utterly undemocratic, utterly un-American.

I have occupied so much time in the past and have inflicted this House on so many occasions with observations on this subject that I had decided not to occupy any time during the consideration of this bill, and I would not do so now except for an incident that occurred a short time ago, alluded to yesterday by the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Texas, which it seems to me justifies the position I have taken and emphasizes the immediate necessity of changing our system, at least to the extent of providing a suitable residence and diplomatic establishment for our ambassador at Berlin.

A few weeks ago the newspapers were filled with stories that the German Emperor had refused to receive Dr. David Jayne Hill, recently designated by the President as our ambassador to Germany. Later this was officially denied by the German Government, and it has since been given out by the German Government that he would be received. Nevertheless, there is no doubt that there was a foundation for these stories beyond mere rumor, and it is undoubtedly true that persons high in authority in Germany have for some time been saying that Doctor Hill was not persona gratissima to the Emperor. Now, what could possibly be the objection to Doctor Hill as an ambassador to any country? Was it that he was not experienced in diplomacy? Not at all, because his experience probably exceeds that of any other American. Was it that he was not sufficiently learned in international law? Not at all, because he is a world-wide authority on that subject. Was it that he was not sufficiently able and representative? Not at all, because he is a man whose ability is unquestioned and who represents preeminently the highest type of American citizenship. No. The objection to him was simply and solely that his private fortune would not enable him to represent properly the dignity of the American nation; that because he was not sufficiently well off to pay the difference between the amount paid him as salary and the amount necessary to properly maintain his position as ambassador, he would not only not be able to keep up such an establishment as that of the present American ambassador, but would not be able to keep up any establishment at all.

Now, without going into the question as to whether our present ambassador has maintained too luxurious an establishment, I think that everybody will concede that the American ambassador to Germany should at least have a house to live in and not be compelled to live in a hotel or a flat. [Applause.] And yet under conditions as they exist in Berlin and in almost every capital of Europe he would have to do so, unless he is either a very rich man or unless this Government should provide a residence for him. Anyone who has ever been in Berlin can not help being impressed by the absence of private dwellings. Practically all buildings are constructed on the apartment-house plan. Thus the problem of finding a separate house presents conditions which would seem almost incredible to anyone who has never been there. The situation simply is that our next ambassador to Germany either must be furnished with a residence by this Government or else must become one of the thousands of other flat dwellers in the city of Berlin. Is this a condition that we can continue much longer to view with stolid equanimity? Is it a condition that comports with the power and wealth and dignity of the American nation?

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Ohio a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will realize that my time is very limited.

Mr. BATES. Has any bill of a legislative character been presented which will enable us to vote on that proposition?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will refer to that in a moment. Is it a system in accordance with the principles upon which this great Republic is based that our ambassador, with the minister, the only other officer of this Government except the President and Vice-President, who represents the whole American people, should live sometimes in a palace and sometimes in a flat? Is it truly democratic that the American embassy should invariably reflect, in a way apparent to the eyes of all, the amount of worldly goods with which the particular incumbent happens to be blessed?

John Smith, a multimillionaire, is succeeded by Tom Jones, a statesman and a scholar. Both are American ambassadors. Both represent the American people. Is it wise or according to republican institutions that it should be flouted in the face of the world that John Smith is a very rich man and that Tom Jones is only moderately well off? And yet that is the condition to-day, and must necessarily remain so until we adopt the plan of providing residences for our diplomatic representatives.

By all means, too, the offices and the residence of the ambassador or minister should be in the same building. The American citizen and the foreign ambassador who have business with the American ambassador should transact their business with him in the same building and under the same conditions.

It is no excuse that we do not act because financial conditions do not warrant the expense. An office-holding aristocracy is bad enough in any country when based on birth and blood, but when based on wealth it is infinitely worse, and worst of all in a republic. [Applause.] I would say that any amount of money was well spent which would uproot such a system from this country. [Applause.]

I want it to be distinctly understood that what I have said is in no sense a reflection upon anyone who is now holding the office of American minister or ambassador. This country has been peculiarly fortunate in the fact that there have been men of large means who have been abundantly well qualified by learning and ability to fill these high offices, and such are the men who are now filling them. But this fact does not in any way destroy the principle that wealth should not be a necessary qualification for any office under this Republic. It would be the cheapest demagogy to say that wealth should be a bar to holding office. On the other hand, it would be arrant flunkeyism to say that it should be a qualification for holding office. [Applause.] It is the right of the American people to be represented by a man and not a pocketbook. [Applause.] And when the man is found who is qualified by learning and ability and patriotism to represent them, it ought to make no difference whether his pocketbook be fat or lean. [Applause.]

If we look upon it purely as a matter of dollars and cents, the expense is very small, and in the long run would be no expense at all. Three million and a half dollars would provide an American embassy in every capital where we have an ambassador, and some legations besides. In ten years they will have greatly increased in value. This has been the experience of every nation that has owned its legations and embassies in foreign capitals. It has been our own experience in the few cases in which we have done this. In Tokyo and Pekin, and in Seoul—where our former legation is now used as the consulate—the property we purchased has enormously increased in value. What better investment can there be in the long run than real estate in the heart of the capital of a great nation?

All that I have said applies almost with equal force to providing consular establishments in some countries, and especially in the Orient. Of course the representative principle is not the same, for a consul does not represent the American people, and it is true that at almost every post our consul can live upon his salary. But especially in the Orient, where we are particularly engaged in expanding our foreign trade and where we are in direct competition with many of the great nations of Europe, we should provide our representatives with proper establishments, so that they may be somewhere nearly on a par with the representatives of other countries. [Applause.]

While I realize that there is little probabilty of a large sum being appropriated at this session of Congress for the purposes I have indicated, I want, in conclusion, to impress upon you the desirability of passing some legislation at this session which, while appropriating only a small amount, would leave to future Congresses the power to make appropriations for these purposes. This could be accomplished by the passage of a bill simply to authorize the Secretary of State to acquire land and buildings for diplomatic establishments and residences and for consular establishments whenever Congress shall appropriate therefor. Then it would be in order to appropriate for each proposition as it comes up on its own merits.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And not be subject to a point of order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It would not be subject to a point of order.

If such a bill could be passed at this session of Congress, carrying an amount sufficient to acquire an embassy in Berlin and an amount sufficient to provide a building to contain a consulate and the consular court at Shanghai, we will have taken a long step in the right direction. Such a bill has been drafted and will shortly be introduced. Pass it and the time will soon be at hand when there will be no office in the gift of the people that can not be held by any man, rich or poor, provided only he measures up to the proper standard, which no amount of wealth can give him, but only learning, ability, and love of his country. [Applause.]

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for twelve minutes.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, as I indicated when the bill was reported and when we went into Committee of the Whole, I shall need but a very few moments to outline the proposition which it contains. I may say that it is much on the line of the bill which we passed at the last session, and particularly so in the increases which we recommend. The bill carries $3,520,283.91, which is $366,130 over our last appropriation, and is $437,000 less than the present estimates. If the matters of foreign appropriation carried in the general appropriation bill at the last session had been included in our bill, the diplomatic bill, the increase proposed in this bill would be less than $300,000 because there was carried in the general appropriation bill $69,000 for various items, and a million dollars for an international bridge across the Rio Grande, which I do not consider in this estimate when I say that the bill would be less than $300,000 over the preceding bill.

The chief feature of this bill now reported, like the chief feature of the preceding bill in the last Congress, is the increase of the contingent fund for our diplomatic service and for our consular service. That is the fund through which the improvement in these establishments can be made, and the only fund through which it can be made. There is no possible way under our rules by which we can provide for the improvement of our chancellories and consulate buildings abroad except through this contingent fund. The increases proposed for the embassies and consulates is $112,500. The increase for the consular contingent fund, which is the largest increase perhaps in the bill, is $175,000, and these two items account for all of the increase in this bill over the last.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COUSINS. I have only twelve minutes, and later, under the five-minute rule, I would be glad to accommodate the gentleman. This is the only way in which this committee can provide for the improvement which is so much demanded for the consulates and chancellories connected with the embassies. We are told about the dilapidated condition of our buildings there and of our service. They are not exactly that, but they are not what they should be. Our consuls in many instances are living in out of the way places that are not consistent with the Government which they represent. The furniture which they have in these buildings is old and dilapidated, but I do not admit that our service is inferior to any in the world. [Applause.]

The men who are living in these places are sometimes located in alleys, but the men who are putting up with this sort of old dilapidated furniture are the best men to-day that ever represented us in our foreign service. [Applause.] Now, I have said as much on that as I need to say at this time, but later on it will be discussed.

There is one item in the bill which I ought to allude to, and that is $18,000 for the improvement of the machinery of the Bureau of the American Republics.

Since the establishment of the Bureau of American Republics in 1890 we have witnessed results that justify our confidence in its purposes and accomplishments. The movement of the various countries of Central and South America in the line of comity and industrial investigation and development is of itself a justification of all that has been expended and all that is proposed, even if there were not a more material justification. I submit this statement, showing the phenomenal growth of trade between the United States and others of the family of American Republics in recent years.

Memorandum showing total trade, exports and imports, with the United States of the twenty countries which, together with the United States, compose the International Union of American Republics and support the International Bureau—Mexico, Guatemala, Salvador, Nicaragua, Honduras, Costa Rica, Panama, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Colombia, Venezuela, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Brazil, Uruguay, Paraguay, Argentina, and Chile.

	Exports from Latin America to United States.	Exports from United States to Latin America.	Total trade.
1890	$186,539,341	$72,571,110	$259,110,451
1895	199,154,286	74,807,946	273,962,232
1900	169,928,283	115,776,654	285,704,937
1905	307,500,108	181,581,296	489,081,404
1907	331,472,793	255,722,152	587,194,945

Increase of United States exports to Latin America, seventeen years, $184,000,000, or 250 per cent.

Increase of United States purchases from Latin America, seventeen years, $145,000,000, or 80 per cent.

Total increase trade exchange, seventeen years, $330,000,000, or over 130 per cent.

NOTE.—These figures show that the commerce of the United States with the Latin American republics during the seventeen years of the existence of the International Bureau of the American Republics has increased by the immense sum of approximately $330,000,000, while in the last two years it has grown nearly $100,000,000.

If there were no other object, Mr. Chairman, than the development of commerce among the American republics, that of itself would be sufficient justification for all that has been done. But there is vastly more achieved and to be accomplished. The very fact of acquaintance and of mutual understanding amounts to even more than trade. We have hitherto been comparatively strangers, although physically near together. Facts concerning commercial intercourse between the various republics are not shown in our Treasury statistics. All that must be revealed by the International Bureau. Knowledge of their various customs, laws, and regulations, and other laws, and of commercial treaties is not set forth in any of our public reports. That must be acquired and compiled by the Bureau. Details of general systems of industrial investigations and of scientific achievements and of resources are not revealed in any of our governmental statements. All that must come to us and to each of these various twenty-one republics through the medium of this International Bureau. We want all this information. They want it all. Proportionately to our various populations, we are paying for the machinery to compile and publish such information, and every one of the republics has joined in the recommendation that an increase of contribution be made on the basis of population, which fixes our share at $18,000, making our annual total contribution $54,000.

These republics recently received our distinguished Secretary of State with generous courtesy that elicits our cordial friendship and our patriotism, and every one of them whose dominion borders on the eastern or the western sea, met with magnanimous hospitality our speeding fleet as it coursed through the friendly waters of the two great oceans on its serene and peaceful way, offering the courtesies of the Atlantic to the far Pacific coast and to the farther oriental world.

The motive which inspires this international intercourse between the American republics is most worthy in its inception and practical development. It partakes of nobler qualities than mere commercial greed. It looks primarily to just and equitable dealing with each other and with the world of nations. It aims at friendly intercourse and at compassing the knowledge of each other's laws and customs relating to trade and industry and education.

The United States does not disguise the fact that we solicit larger trade relations with the American republics, believing that all would be benefited thereby. It is not necessary to disclaim motives of territorial exploitation. Our highest ideal is responsible, respectable, and successful government in all the American republics. We are neighbors, and the fundamental principle of the Monroe doctrine may be thereby sustained. We invite the consideration of every one of these republics in support of that historic doctrine. We solicit their friendly and commercial intercourse, but not their territory. Successful, solvent, and responsible self-government on the American Continent at all times will be the happiest realization of the United States. We depend upon them to see to it that no justification shall arise for any power to encroach upon their territory. [Applause.]

Your committee have unanimously joined in the recommendation of the governing board of the various republics proposing the proportionate increase for improving the machinery to carry on the good work of this international establishment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES OF AMBASSADORS AND MINISTERS.

Ambassadors extraordinary and plenipotentiary to Austria-Hungary, Brazil, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Russia, and Turkey, at $17,500 each, $175,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal in recent years about the improvement in the diplomatic service. To those of us who have traveled much abroad this improvement is not so evident. Of course it is not fair to compare the diplomats of to-day with the diplomats of former times, times when men were selected for the diplomatic service by reason of their craft or cunning, and were sent, as a wit of former days has said, to "lie abroad for their country," or were sent abroad to negotiate single handed a treaty with some astute sovereign in Europe, or, if necessary, to overturn a dynasty. The foreign cable has entirely changed the state of affairs to-day, so that critics have said that our foreign ambassadors now are in some cases little more than messenger boys to carry the dispatches sent to them by the Department of State for transmission to the foreign secretaries. Thus it has come about that in the selection of diplomats in the last decade more attention seems to be paid to external appearance than to the man himself. Old William of Wickham said that "manners maketh man."

Well, perhaps they do make man, but it is sometimes doubtful what the man is stuffed with, whether it is sawdust or a backbone that is underneath. This has come about very largely because of the sensitiveness of the American public to criticism by the foreign chancelleries of what they used to call our "shirt-sleeve diplomacy." Foreign critics may perhaps overlook the fact when they talk about our shirt-sleeve diplomats that at six different times in the history of our country our Government has been obliged to dismiss foreign representatives of the most polite nations of Europe in the United States for gross breaches of propriety or of manners. Our diplomats abroad have no such record as that, but still they have been pretty universally criticised as shirt-sleeve diplomats. Now, shirt sleeves are not very beautiful to behold, but it is a pretty good costume to work in and it is a pretty good costume for a fight, if need be, and the almost unbroken line of diplomatic successes made by our shirt-sleeve diplomats in the past are certainly sufficient to justify the selection of the men that we have sent abroad. [Applause.]

The modern tendency is, however, away from a shirt-sleeve diplomacy, and is to select dinner-table diplomats or dietetic diplomats. The modern ambassadors are selected apparently because of their riches, and the under secretaries because of their club membership in the exclusive clubs at home; the rich men because they may be able to give banquets and thereby, as the old saying is, "reach the heart" of the foreign monarch through his stomach. The under secretaries, not perhaps because they are able to give these banquets, but because of the table manners with which they are possessed, so that they may fill the definition of gentility given by Chaucer when he held up to succeeding generations for admiration the picture of a perfect lady as one who "let no morsel from her lippes drop." Now, table manners seem to be the chief requirement of our secretaries of embassy. The Department seems to operate in the selection of them very much in the way that one of our famous preparatory schools in New England selects scholars for admission to study at that school. Those scholars only are admitted whose mothers belong to the "Four Hundred," and that is the method apparently by which the selections have been made for our secretaries of embassy or legation abroad.

Now, of course, it is ridiculous to assert that rich men are not capable per se of being efficient diplomats. Some of our very rich men have been our very best diplomats. It is true particularly at the Court of St. James, where, I think, our last two diplomats, Mr. Joseph H. Choate and Mr. Whitelaw Reid, both very rich men, have ranked up in character, in intelligence and efficiency, well with the foremost of the long list of distinguished Americans whom we have had at the court of England; but when the lavish extravagance or expenditure of American money at the courts of Europe creates such an inordinate appetite for American luxury among the minor officials of the courts there as to bring humiliation upon the head of a man of more moderate means, one of the most distinguished and capable public servants we have in our foreign service, when his name is proposed to represent the American people at Berlin, then, I say, it is time to call a halt; and then, I say, it is time to apply the remedy suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] in the speech which he has just made. At least if we build these embassies abroad, we will prevent the possibility in the future of these violent fluctuations between the "wherewithal" and style of living of ambassadors who succeed one another at those posts.

Now, to return for a moment to a discussion of the secretaries of embassy, a magnificent example of what I have said of the "Four Hundred" process of selection is our first secretary in London to-day, a most amiable and charming gentleman and one who reminds one irresistibly of the white rabbit in "Alice in Wonderland." As he scuttles through the drawing-rooms of London you can picture him saying: "Oh, the duchess! the duchess! oh, my fur and whiskers, I shall be late!" What do you suppose this gentleman says to himself when he is left all alone as chargé d'affaires of that embassy and contemplates the firm and determined stand taken by an American diplomat in London in the past (Charles Francis Adams) at a time when grave national peril was upon us—the man who said to the English prime minister: "It is perhaps superfluous for me to point out to your lordship that this is war." That is an example, if you like, of shirt-sleeve diplomacy, but it was an example of a manly and vigorous defense of this country in time of need upon which, perhaps, we can not count with all of our diplomats to-day.

Now, another dietetic diplomat, if I may call him such, is our ambassador to France to-day. He has spent the greater portion of his years in the foreign service, and consequently it may be that he has lost touch somewhat with American sentiment. Anyway, the newspapers have reported recently that our ambassador to the sister Republic of France is in the habit of appearing at public functions in court costume, in silk knickerbockers and gold lace and a gold-hilted sword, maybe. I do not know whether this report is correct, but if it be so, I would commend to our ambassador to the sister Republic of France a study of the Revised Statutes, which specifically forbid the wearing by our ambassadors abroad of any costume not previously authorized by Congress.

I would commend to him also a study of the historic stand taken by Minister James Buchanan at the Court of St. James, in which he insisted upon appearing in the plain dress of an American gentleman, and I will call our ambassador's attention, further, to the picture of that former representative at the court of France, when that court was the wittiest and the richest and the most luxurious court of the day. I refer to the first, the foremost, and the greatest of all our diplomatic representatives abroad, Benjamin Franklin. [Applause.] Mr. Franklin appeared in that scene of laces, and ruffles, and perfume, and powder, silk knickerbockers, and red-heeled slippers, and white wigs as the representative of this Republic, clad, as a French writer of that day reports, "in the plain dress of an American cultivator." In his brown coat and round hat, and wearing his own hair rather than a wig, instead of being the object of ridicule he became the object of adulation from everybody in that Kingdom from prince to peasant. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I have been a good deal interested in the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] and in those of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] with reference to the accommodations our representatives abroad should have and their compensation. I can not say that I am greatly impressed with the argument that is deduced from the alleged incident that recently was said to have occurred at Berlin, when the diminutive rent roll of an accomplished American scholar was said to have been received with a royal sniff. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] has spoken of the era of the shirt-sleeved diplomat from America. I am forcibly reminded by this incident of another era, when the same sort of diplomat existed abroad. Macaulay is authority for the statement that in the days when Frederick the Great was king his ministers at foreign courts walked on foot or drove shabby old carriages until the axletrees broke. The total charge of the royal kitchen was said to be less than $10,000 a year. His majesty had but a single gala dress, which lasted him all his life. Those were days of poverty for Prussia, but they were also days of glory. And if there is any foundation for the incident at Berlin, then it seems emphatically to mark the difference between that time and this. I do not think there is any necessary connection between splurge and ostentation on the part of our diplomats and their real efficiency. I think the raising of the grade of our representatives in certain cases from that of minister to that of ambassador has not had an entirely good effect. It has made those offices more and more the game of very rich men, and it seems to threaten a porky and showy era, which nobody could desire to see. I believe, however, that we should provide our ministers and ambassadors with suitable residences, that they may maintain the style of living of an American gentleman, and that they may represent this Government with the simplicity and with the dignity such as is befitting the representatives of a democratic republic.

The proposed bill for the embassy at Berlin is a very good one. I trust that it may be brought into the House and become a law, and that we may provide residences elsewhere and make the salaries larger than they now are, so that men who are fitted to represent this country abroad may represent it, even if they do not have large private fortunes. I think that these offices will become less and less the game under such a system for very wealthy men, for men who may have relieved the aching void in campaign chests and would take these places as their compensation. [Applause.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire in a few words to reply to some statements made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] concerning the American ambassador to France. It seems to me he was peculiarly unfortunate in selecting that particular diplomatic representative of the United States for criticism. He is the only ambassador representing the United States who has worked his way up to his present dignity on merit. He has been successively appointed to one position after another because of valuable service.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I think the gentleman has forgotten the case of Ambassador Riddle at St. Petersburg, who has gone clear up from the bottom of the service, and I think to some extent it is the case with Doctor Hill at Berlin.

Mr. HARRISON. How about Lloyd Griscom at Rome?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will allow the gentleman to make his own speech. My information has been that Ambassador White, representing the United States in France, is the only ambassador who began his diplomatic career abroad in a subordinate position. I think it was in London, probably as a secretary.

Certainly if there is any representative of the United States who has worked his way up by merit through several administrations, it is Ambassador White. Anyone who has had an opportunity of observing Ambassador White in the performance of his official duties abroad will recognize the truth of what I say when I assert that he is one of the American ambassadors most considerate and courteous to Americans in the discharge of his duties. This is in contrast with some other diplomatic and consular dignitaries abroad. He is, moreover, most democratic and simple in his habits, and altogether most representative of the American spirit of democracy.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me for just a moment? I intended to say, right in line of what the gentleman is saying, that I think Mr. White is a very excellent ambassador.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to have the testimony of the gentleman from Massachusetts in this matter. At the time I visited Paris last year, Ambassador White was living in a rented house, an artist's studio, in the simplest and most unostentatious fashion. He was conducting himself more like an American citizen abroad than like a high official seeking to copy foreign fashions. Having had a little experience with ambassadors and consuls in other places at various times when I have been abroad, I am very glad to be able to testify to the fact that Henry White is a representative American, and that he has little ostentation in his make-up and as little official formality as can be found in any position of ambassadorial dignity.

I think that the gentleman from New York could hardly have seriously intended to attack Mr. White personally in this House on a mere idle newspaper report, of which the foundation has been by no means established. Our representative in France is an American ambassador who stands—if not as the only one, at least prominent—as one who has worked himself up by merit through the minor positions in the diplomatic service. It seems to me that is exactly the sort of service that ought to be encouraged, and not attacked upon the floor of the House of Representatives, and any such suggestion is rather unfair.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor to differ a little from my colleague on the committee [Mr. HARRISON]. I am not a member of the "400" and he is, and is, therefore, perhaps, more competent to judge as to the proper conduct of those coming within the "400." But I have traveled abroad as the representative of the Government. I have not had comparative experience, because I have only been abroad twice—both times last year and both times representing the Government. I have never seen the first secretary to the embassy at London, but had occasion to ask him just one thing, and that in writing, during my four days' stay in London. It was attended to quickly and accurately, and therefore, while, so far as I know, he may spend his evenings marching through drawing rooms, during business hours I can testify he attends to business. [Applause.]

Now, in relation to the ambassador at Paris, I have not the pleasure of his personal acquaintance, but I have been in Rome, where he was ambassador. I know Americans who lived there during the time he was there, good Methodist people who belonged to the Methodist Church, and that is a church which is never accused of being in favor of extra circumstance and style, and among those people and among others he left a good impression of his qualities as an American gentleman; and if there is any place where there is a temptation to ostentation and display it is the capital at Rome.

Now, as to the secretaries. For the most part they are rich men. Here we are providing in the bill for the third secretary to the embassy at Constantinople $1,200. The second secretary gets $2,000. Of course they spend more money than that. That is the system; whether right or wrong I do not attempt at this time to say.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him at this place?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman overlooks the fact that the ambassador takes at least sixty days' leave of absence each year and his entire salary goes to the first secretary, so that he gets that, and the minister's salary goes on at the same time.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I had that impression myself. I thought the salary went to the secretary, but after some inquiry abroad, I am inclined to think that that is a matter of personal arrangement between the minister and the secretary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have served on the Committee on Appropriations which considered the deficiency appropriation bill, and have seen these salaries paid at this end of the line, and understood that it was the customary thing to do.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Then the gentleman knows, and of course it would go to the first secretary; but as to the other secretaries, I found at every southern port of Europe and Asia I visited, efficient men, so far as my individual judgment is concerned, in the diplomatic service, particularly the men who were acting as first secretaries and in the consular service, who were spending more than we are paying them. I have seen an American representative in foreign countries living in two rooms, establishing one room as an office, when his total compensation from fees, after paying clerk hire, must have been less than $400 a year. He speaks five languages, and the day I was there had 120 visits from people interested in American affairs.

I have met these secretaries in Constantinople, in Rome, and elsewhere, and I have always found them prompt and efficient. It is no discredit to a man that he is rich. There are some gentlemen on both sides of this House who labor under that embarrassment. The only question is, "Is he attending to his duties?" And as far as I can find out, these gentlemen are.

Now, I have introduced a bill that I should like to see the Committee on Foreign Affairs report, and I am glad that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] is here, because he is chairman of the subcommittee, to provide for a commission of three Members from this House and three from the Senate, to go abroad and go through our consulates and embassies, and get the knowledge which will guide us in our legislation on the floor of this House. I do not say that we are not legislating efficiently now, but that will enable us to legislate with a greater degree of knowledge on these subjects.

[The time of Mr. BENNET of New York having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. I can urge this, because it would be of no personal benefit to me in the most remote degree, because the bill provides that the three men from the House shall be members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that the three members of the commission from the Senate shall be members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and I am not on the House committee.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Does not the gentleman think the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds should be consulted in matters of this kind? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will say for the information of the House that the gentleman who has just spoken was on a commission appointed in the last Congress, which came over to New York and had a good time for two or three days, investigating our post-office building, and I am not opposed to letting him go as far as he wants to. The result of that visit, I may say, was that his commission has recommended a very good bill, that I hope the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will report before the Congress ends.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Judging from the results of the investigation in New York, the result of an investigation abroad would be the same.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York if it is not true of the consular service in many cases that the service rendered or to be rendered is not of sufficient importance to make it worth while to try to have any service at all?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Oh, no; I think the consular service is of great benefit.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I mean at minor places that are insignificant.

Mr. BENNET of New York. At places of that kind we are usually represented by a consular agent, who gets no compensation except the fees that he takes in. He costs the Government nothing, and he is recompensed largely by the dignity of the position.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will you cite us to a case of that sort?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will, in the island of Corfu, in the city of Damascus, in the city of Jaffa, and in the city of Kaifa. Our consular agents in the island of Corfu averages about $15 a year in compensation, and when the American fleet visited that island some years ago, he gave all the officers of the fleet a dinner that cost him more money than he can ever hope to receive in compensation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Was he from Tennessee?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No; nor from Missouri either.

Mr. MANN. Did that dinner benefit the public service any, or did it permit the fellow to swell himself as he wanted to?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I do not know that that particular thing benefited the service, but he is there day after day, attending to the wants of American citizens.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have absolute confidence in and high regard for what the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] ordinarily says, and I have no doubt he thinks he is well informed and has just reasons for the statement he has made concerning our ambassador to France, but after my own personal experience on a visit to that embassy I should feel that I was not doing justice to Mr. White if I did not make a statement concerning my own personal observations on the occasion of my visit there last July. I had never met the ambassador prior to that time, but I must say that he is a man of very courteous and democratic manner, very cordial, and in my conversation with him, which lasted a considerable time, I was impressed that he was a most thorough and patriotic American. What others may have observed and what they may have learned I do not know, but I was thoroughly impressed upon my visit that we were well represented in that city, at that court, by a thorough and patriotic American, and one of whom we would have no occasion to be ashamed.

I have no doubt that what the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] has said and what a number of others have said here in relation to the necessity for better service and better paid consular and diplomatic officers is absolutely correct. So far as my own personal observation goes, I believe we are getting a much better service than we are entitled to for the compensation paid. This question should be agitated, should be considered, and should not be allowed to rest until the people of this country show a proper appreciation of the services they are getting abroad.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think one of the most serious criticisms that can be made to the supply bills that are coming into the House in this Congress and the last few Congresses are that almost every appropriation committee that represents a particular branch of the Government service is advocating an increase of salaries of those services because the men who occupy the positions can not maintain a social position on the salary they now receive. I believe that the officers of this Government, whether they are in Congress, in the Army, or in the diplomatic service, should receive a sufficient compensation to properly care for themselves and their families and maintain the position in life of an American citizen. But I do not agree at all with the proposition that is advocated that the officers of this Government must maintain a position in society of their social standing. They do not represent the American people when they seek to maintain such a position.

Now, I have no criticism whatever to make of these people of great wealth in this country that do maintain a social position and set the pace for a social position. I think the country should be congratulated that they attempt to do so, that they have their great houses, their country villas, their retinue of servants, which is beneficial to the country, because they spend the money which they have accumulated; but it is no part of the position of the officers of the American Government to attempt to copy the pace, with that standing and that position, either at home or abroad.

The persons who maintain the high positions in this country—the club member in the great city, or the man of great wealth, the society man—do not in any way in this country represent the people or the sentiment of the people of the United States, and never have and never will. They may do so in the aristocracy such as we find in London or in Berlin, but they do not represent the people here, and it is not necessary for us to pay salaries commensurate with that class that live there to our ambassadors abroad, the Army and Navy officers at home, or to Members of Congress.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman believe that the present British ambassador to this country lives with any undue display or in any manner in which the representative of a great power should not live?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I must say that I am not a society man myself; and although I have been here twelve or thirteen years, I have not been thrown into contact with the ambassador from Great Britain—only on one or two occasions—and I have no means of my own of judging as to the form in which he lives or conducts himself.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman knows nothing which would induce him to make such a statement?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have made no such statement.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I asked him for the purpose of pointing out the fact that the present British ambassador to this country receives a salary of $50,000 a year, lives in an embassy rent free, which is kept up for him by the British Government; that the present British ambassador, being one of the greatest scholars in the world and not being a man of wealth or independent means, asked of Great Britain, before accepting the position of ambassador to this country, an increase of salary of, I think, $5,000 a year over that which had previously been given to the British ambassador.

[The time of Mr. UNDERWOOD having expired, by unanimous consent he was granted five minutes more.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will take that as an example. I acknowledge my ignorance absolutely as to the mode of life of the British ambassador, but I will say that I presume the British ambassador comes here to represent his people in an official way, to come in contact with the officials of this Government. I take it as a matter of course that whether he spends $2,500 or whether he spends $50,000 in maintaining his establishment in this city his access to the President of the United States and his influence with the President of the United States and members of the Cabinet will not be affected one iota in the city of Washington. [Applause.]

As to his relations to the other branches of this Government, I doubt very much whether there are 10 per cent of the members of the Congress of the United States that have ever been invited into his home. I suppose that the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and some others have been there. If the British ambassador spends a large amount of money in this city, it is to maintain his social status with the society people of Washington, and certainly is not spent to aid any influence or any upholding of his position so far as representing the British Government before the American people.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I should think probably the last criticism that could be made or passed upon Mr. Bryce, the present ambassador, would be that he was a society dude.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have not made that criticism. The gentleman puts words in my mouth that I have not uttered. I simply say—and I challenge the gentleman to correct the statement—that it is probable that the British ambassador has not received within his establishment 10 per cent of the Members of Congress of the United States, and that whether he spends one dollar of his great salary for entertainment or whether he lives in a very moderate capacity, his mode of life would not affect his influence as ambassador of Great Britain one iota with the President of the United States or the Cabinet officers with whom he is here to transact his business.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, of course not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it is true here, why should it not be true abroad? Can any gentleman say that because we have an ambassador at the Court of St. James who can spend a fortune every year in entertaining the nobility of England, that that affects his standing with the British ministry; that that aids us in carrying on the diplomatic arrangement of this Government with the British Government? Why, not at all. Of course we want our ambassadors abroad, our Army and Navy officers at home, and our representatives of the Government of the United States in every capacity to live in a way that will do credit to the United States Government, but it does not require vast sums of money to maintain such a position.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman surely would not say that it was a proper condition where a circumstance could arise sure as arose last year, when our ambassador at Paris, of whom some unpleasant things have been said to-day, I think most unjustly, was compelled to send out notice to all American citizens in Paris on the 4th of July, saying it was impossible for the American ambassador to receive American citizens upon that day because he had no quarters in which to receive them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am satisfied the American citizens if they wanted to see him, would have been glad to meet him in his hotel.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the question of the dignity, character, and fitness of our ambassadors abroad. Some of them have been overrich and several of them have been a bit snobbish, but as a rule they are thoroughly competent, courteous, and efficient men. I agree with much that was in the interview coming from the pen of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DENBY] the other day. Undoubtedly, I agree that these employees of the Government ought to have homes. I do not see any necessity for some things now that go on when they do not have homes, however. For instance, a very courteous gentleman, very effective in his public work, very efficient in every way, is the ambassador of the Court of St. James, but there is no particular reason why he should rent Dorchester House, and there is no particular reason why anybody else, when employed as minister plenipotentiary or ambassador or otherwise, should think that our ambassador at St. James had created a standard with which he should put himself on a level.

What I arose for, however, Mr. Chairman, was to ask the chairman of the committee why it was that there should have been an increase of $2,000 a year in the salary of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at Chile, and why the change of law in the next paragraph should have been made, giving us two new ministers to Central America in addition to the old roll.

Mr. COUSINS. I will say to the gentleman that if he will hold that in abeyance until we get to that paragraph, perhaps we can simplify it. I would be very glad to give him such explanation as I can.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I thought we had reached that. When we get to that paragraph, instead of having to ask the gentleman again, I hope he will rise and explain to the House.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, though I occupied some time of the committee yesterday, I wish to speak a word in connection with the debate which has arisen this morning. Doubtless there is no necessity for and no one desires unnecessary and extravagant display. On the other hand, anyone who thinks, as apparently the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] thinks, that the social relations are unimportant in any diplomat or can be disregarded by any Government, shows an insufficient knowledge of the subject. My friend from New York [Mr. HARRISON] in the criticisms he made, in which I do not wholly agree, and in some remarks he made in reference to the service, in which I entirely agree, cited Benjamin Franklin as an exemplar of a great and wise American sent to perform public duty abroad. In that judgment everyone will agree. The career of Benjamin Franklin in his diplomatic relations was of more importance to the success of this country in the Revolution than that of any other man in the country except George Washington. He went an untried man to France, and had a record of success in obtaining assistance from that country of men and money and an alliance that can not be excelled in any diplomatic career. My friend commented upon the wisdom that Franklin showed in his costume. His costume was not always quite as severely democratic as my friend suggests.

He had the wisdom to dress just well enough and never too well, and always maintained just enough of the Philadelphia Quaker, mingled with the costume of the foreign country, so there should be nothing that would be unseemly. But I wish to come to the importance of social relations as illustrated in Franklin's career. No one would claim that he was a multimillionaire, who went abroad to spend his money, or a social snob who wished to display his graces. We all know that Franklin combined to a extraordinary extent the practical common sense, by which he did the thing that was necessary to accomplish a result. He was abroad to obtain assistance for us from another country, and that result he obtained. Now, Franklin knew perfectly that in order to obtain the best results for his own country social relations by no means could be disregarded. Six days of almost every week, as those know who are familiar with the history of those times, he was constantly in social life, one of its most popular members. He lived at his own house in Passy. He visited largely. Any person in France whose position was such that he could be of service to the Republic, that person Franklin would know, and if he did not know him, he found a way to know him. These people he met pleasantly, wisely, and agreeably through social life. He was not paid a salary, but his expenses were paid, and we may be sure that Benjamin Franklin, wise and patriotic, wasted no penny of the scanty funds of the thirteen struggling Colonies in social life or social relations, except as he felt was for the good of the country whose representative he was.

During the long years he was there, first going there, as I remember, in 1777 and continuing until the treaty was signed in 1783, he was paid for his expenses, which were at the house at Passy (which, by the way, was given him rent free by a Frenchman, a great admirer of this country and of Franklin), he was paid for the expenses rendered necessary by his mode of life on an average of £3,000 a year. That was $15,000, and no one will question that $15,000 in 1777 represented quite as much in purchasing power and in the expense of living as $50,000 would to-day. The man who spent $15,000 in 1776 was a rare man in this country. There were few who lived in that way, and yet that was the average expenditure for the social life of this diplomat, perhaps the best and wisest diplomat that this country has ever had. I think we may safely, in fixing the appropriations for our ambassadors to-day, follow the example that was set by the first and greatest of American ambassadors—Benjamin Franklin. [Applause.]

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized to strike out the last word of the paragraph.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the criticisms leveled by my colleague from New York [Mr. HARRISON] against the first secretary of our embassy at London, for I have always understood that that gentleman, who has worked himself up from the position of third secretary, I believe, to that of first secretary, was one of the most useful men in our diplomatic service. I am quite sure that he had the confidence of Mr. Choate when he was ambassador. It is my impression that Mr. Choate recommended his retention there as one of the secretaries, and I had supposed that he had the full confidence and esteem of our present ambassador to Great Britain, Mr. Reid. I know that, so far as the State Department is concerned, our first secretary there has the Department's full confidence, and that when the ambassador is absent the Department does not hesitate to confide to Mr. Carter matters of great delicacy and importance. I do this in justice to him in order to correct any wrong impression that might have been made by my colleague. I do not know just what he had in mind.

I would like to say something in answer to the gentleman from Alabama on this matter of the position which our ambassadors should have in foreign countries. At the time that Mr. William Walter Phelps, who was long a Member of this House, was ambassador to Berlin I was a student at the University of Berlin.

Mr. Phelps was a man of large means, but not a man of display. He kept open house to all Americans, and it was the universal testimony of the men who were studying there that they were enormously helped by the fact that he was a man of means and in that way was enabled to know all the prominent men in German public life, and so could help the students there in numberless little ways. Mr. Phelps, who was a man of a great deal of ability, was able to do this, however, largely because of his ability to entertain, due to his large means. He did entertain extensively, although not lavishly, and came to know all the prominent men in German public life and knew them intimately, among them Bismarck. Having been a student, I can say from their point of view that this sort of legislation, which will always enable our ambassadors to maintain decent establishments, will help all Americans resident abroad, especially the student class.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there? We all know Mr. Phelps's great reputation as a man of ability. We know that, and a few of us know of his reputation as a man of wealth, and I would like to know as to whether the gentleman thinks that Mr. Phelps's standing with the able, distinguished, and learned men of Germany was based on his wealth or on his distinguished ability as a student and a statesman?

Mr. PARSONS. It was a combination of the two. So far as his official position was concerned, in negotiations as a representative of this country he represented what the country stood for, but he would not have known as intimately as he did, and in a way that was beneficial to the country, the important men of Germany unless he had been able to keep up a considerable establishment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not agree with the gentleman. I think Mr. Phelps and all other able men abroad are received for their ability and not for their wealth by the able men of the country they visit.

Mr. PARSONS. I give that as the contemporaneous testimony of the students who were there at the time.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in order to give our ambassadors a chance to do justice to this great country, to give dignity to their position, one or the other thing is necessary. Either we have got to raise their salaries or we must give them buildings in which to live and in which to do their work. When I was in Berlin seven months ago, my pride as an American citizen was somewhat wounded when, after looking at the beautiful embassies of other countries, I found the office of the American ambassador, the representative of the United States, in the second story of an unpretentious-looking building and over a second-hand book store, with a little two-by-three flag, our glorious banner, dangling from the window. Now, right across the street was the Russian embassy, with an immense banner over the building, and a little farther up the street the French, the Spanish, and others. I tell you, gentlemen, if we want to be represented right and have prestige in those countries, we must give our ambassadors sufficient funds to live so as to lend dignity to the office, and we ought to furnish them with proper buildings. The ambassador in Berlin pays $20,000 rent for his private residence. He only receives $17,500 per year salary. Now, it is contrary to all traditions of this country to send only rich men to represent us in foreign lands, and as it is to-day, with the salaries our representatives are receiving and with no embassies, men of limited means can not maintain the official dignity due our great country. For that reason I say we must do either one thing or the other, increase their salaries or give them proper buildings in which to live.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], who seems to know a great deal about this, what is the intention of the proponents of this embassy-building matter with reference to increasing the salaries of ambassadors and ministers abroad?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That, so far as I know, is not embodied in any bill before Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know it is not embodied in this bill, but is it embodied in the intention of the proponent of this measure?

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman refers to me as one of the proponents, it is not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do refer to you, because you introduced the bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; I have never advocated the increase in direct compensation—that is to say, the salary.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. My understanding is that the gentleman from Ohio is the first man that introduced the bill to construct these embassy buildings. I want to ask him a question that I asked the gentleman from New York yesterday, and that is, if he thinks that the influence and standing of the United States depends in any manner on the style in which our foreign representatives live?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, I think not at all; I think the great difficulty is in inducing, under the circumstances, any man not of great wealth, who is otherwise well qualified, to accept the position at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If these buildings are constructed and we own them, that does not anyway near place our representatives abroad on an equal footing with the representative of Russia, for instance, named by the gentleman from Wisconsin, as to the amount of money they can spend, does it?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, not at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then why not go the "whole hog?"

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, I do not know that I would go the "whole hog." The trouble is that the authorities in charge of appropriations keep too tight hold on the national purse strings, I think—at least, so far as expenditures abroad are concerned.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word or two about what the gentleman from New York said about Benjamin Franklin. I think he was one of the greatest representatives we ever had abroad; and I have no doubt if the gentleman says that he had £3,000 per annum that he spent it. But I wish to suggest to the gentleman from New York and everybody else concerned that the time at which Benjamin Franklin represented this country abroad and the circumstances in which he found himself and his country in those days were entirely different from the situation in which our representatives abroad find themselves now. Their duty is purely perfunctory, as a rule. Their chief duty is to have a good time, as I apprehend. Franklin's business over there was to cultivate the grandees and the financiers of France and make them sufficiently friendly toward us, in the first place, to recognize our independence, and in the second place to lend us money with which to carry on the Revolutionary war. Naturally and inevitably that was an expensive business.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Doubtless at many periods the duties of the diplomat are exceedingly slight. There may be no need of having a representative for some time. But the theory is, and the only theory on which we maintain a diplomatic corps is, that the time will come when our representative will have some important work to do. Does not my friend from Missouri think that when Mr. Adams was at the Court of St. James during the civil war that it was of value to him to have had personal association and agreeable relations with the men he was to meet?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly; and his situation was almost identical with that of Franklin. My excuse for making any remarks on this subject at all is that I served with a great deal of pleasure and advantage to myself for six years on the Foreign Affairs Committee, and my own conclusion about these representatives abroad is this—I do not know that a single soul on earth agrees with me about it—it would be better really to withdraw the entire diplomatic corps as a general thing, and then when we need a representative at a foreign court, whenever we have need for anyone to attend to these delicate duties—and they are sometimes very delicate—pick out a man of the highest capacity in this country, whether he has not a dollar or a hundred millions. I am not in favor of discriminating against a rich man because he has got money if he got it honestly, or a poor man because he has not got it. Send him there and give him a sufficient sum of money, whatever it may be, to do these social honors and make the friends that we need on those occasions. The Federal Government would have been entirely justified in giving Charles Francis Adams $100,000 a year to spend in his diplomatic duties in England, or if the Confederacy could have gotten a representative over there accredited to the court the Confederacy would have been justified in spending $100,000 or £100,000 to cultivate friendly relations with that Government. I am not in favor of our ministers undertaking to keep up with the richest of those nobles. You take the Duke of Bedford, for instance. I do not know whether he is participating in public life or not; but there are only two or three men in the United States that can vie with him in his expenditures—perhaps only Rockefeller and this man out in Wisconsin, who owns all the timber out there, whatever his name is.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this paragraph be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, debate on the paragraph will be now closed, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SCHEDULE A.

SALARIES OF AMBASSADORS AND MINISTERS.

Ambassadors extraordinary and plenipotentiary to Austria-Hungary, Brazil, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Russia, and Turkey, at $17,500 each, $175,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The motion before the House has not been disposed of. I mean the motion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the pro forma amendment will be considered as having been withdrawn. Debate upon this paragraph having been closed, the Chair directed the Clerk to proceed to read the next paragraph.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, whenever a motion is before the House and that motion is not withdrawn, it is the duty of the Chair not to pass to the next paragraph until the motion has been withdrawn or disposed of.

The gentleman made a motion to strike out the last word, and that motion is still pending before the House.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CAPRON). The Chair recalls clearly that the Chair stated distinctly, in reply to the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS], chairman of the committee, that debate having been exhausted upon this paragraph, without objection the Clerk would read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Chair did, but the Chair did not state that without objection the pro forma amendment would be withdrawn, and it has got to be disposed of now. I ask that the formal amendment may be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that the method by which we proceed when a motion is made to strike out the last word has become a custom almost, but the Chair stands corrected by the gentleman from Mississippi, and now announces that the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word will, without objection, be considered as having been withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do not break down any of my barriers. I may need them later on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6200. An act granting a perpetual easement and right of way to Salt Lake City, Utah, for the construction, operation, maintenance, repair, and renewal of a conduit and pipe line and valve houses upon and across the Fort Douglas Military Reservation;

S. 4723. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in fee to the Protestant Episcopal Church for certain lands in Wisconsin set apart for the use of the said church for missionary purposes among the Oneida Indians; and

S. 3732. An act regulating injunctions and the practice of the district and circuit courts of the United States.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 17305. An act to regulate the establishment and maintenance of private hospitals and asylums in the District of Columbia.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 6200. An act granting a perpetual easement and right of way to Salt Lake City, Utah, for the construction, operation, maintenance, repair, and renewal of a conduit and pipe line and valve houses upon and across the Fort Douglas Military Reservation—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 3732. An act regulating injunctions and the practice of the district and circuit courts of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 4723. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in fee to the Protestant Episcopal Church for certain lands in Wisconsin set apart for the use of the said church for missionary purposes among the Oneida Indians—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the Argentine Republic, Belgium, Chile, China, Cuba, the Netherlands and Luxemburg, and Spain, at $12,000 each, $84,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of renewing very briefly the discussion which ceased a few moments ago. I would not do this at this time, but on several occasions when an amendment has been offered to this bill providing for the purchase or provision of embassies abroad I have made a point of order upon it, and I shall do the same thing if such an amendment be proposed at this time.

I have served in this House now a little more than eleven years. Not gifted with any great amount of wealth, though I have had the distinction of being published among the list of millionaires, that is the nearest I have ever got to owning very much. I have yet to learn that in this House it makes any difference whether a man has wealth and lives high, or whether he has no wealth and lives economically. I have yet to learn where the foreign embassies are in Washington, with one exception. Although I have visited more than one, I would not be able to locate more than one, and I think that is a wholly undesirable place to live in. That is the one out on Connecticut avenue, which does no credit to any government, though doubtless it was wise as a purchase of property at the time it was established. I have yet to learn that those ambassadors or ministers who entertain their own circle, consisting of other ambassadors and ministers, exercise any more influence in affairs diplomatic than the ones who attend to the business of their country, regardless of their social affairs or the wealth that they display in living.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. MANN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I beg to suggest that the gentleman with his acute intellect is a little bit away from the proposition.

Mr. MANN. Then do not interrupt me until I get to it.

Mr. PERKINS. I will ask the gentleman a question which perhaps will turn his attention in that direction.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois decline to yield?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I always yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PERKINS. The proposition made was not one for an increase of the salaries, so as to allow a very large expenditure for the purposes of social display, but was for the purchase of buildings that should be permanent homes in foreign capitals for this nation, which is a quite different question from that of social display.

Mr. MANN. I can see no distinction at all. That is the very purpose of it, social display.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman, hoping that the committee will give me a little time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The question I want to propound is suggested by the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois. As I understand it, England owns the embassy building up on Connecticut avenue, a very commodious and, as I think, not an unpleasantly located structure, and it gives the ambassador from England $38,000 a year.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Fifty thousand dollars a year.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think that in furnishing that building and giving the ambassador a salary of $50,000 a year, as I am informed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], it is for purposes of social display, when they send as ambassador here a scholar and statesman like James Bryce?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised that a gentleman for whom I have such great respect and who is usually so particular about the niceties of social affairs should ask such a question as that, which he knows it would not be polite for me to answer under any consideration in any way but one. I will remind the gentleman, however, that England does not own the embassy. It is Great Britain that owns it. In that respect, on questions of facts, I seem to be a little ahead of the gentleman.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a few years ago the salary paid a Representative in Congress was $5,000 a year, and the salary of a Senator was the same. It is now $7,500 a year, and the salary of a Senator is the same. So far as I have been able to ascertain, the Members of Congress are able to live in some way on their salaries and to attend to the public business, and it makes no difference here whether a Member lives on more than $7,500 a year or less than $7,500 a year if he attends to the duties of the office which he fills here.

In my judgment it makes no difference abroad whether the man spends large sums of money or smaller sums of money, if he attends to the duties of the office, for the duties of the office do not consist in social entertainment. Why, according to the theory of some gentlemen here, it would be necessary, owing to the great expense of living of some gentlemen in this House, to give them homes to live in, to give other people possibly homes to live in, in order to live on the same basis. We have not got to that yet in this country, and I hope we will not. Ah, but the gentleman from Wisconsin says he has looked at a Russian consulate side by side with an American consulate. I point to the distinction between the Russian Government and the American Government. Let Russia have her consulates; let us have our Government and the respect of the country and of the world and of our people. If Russia prefers to spend her money in consulates and have dissatisfaction at home, that is the privilege of Russia. I prefer the spirit of Americanism abroad and the quality of satisfaction at home. [Applause.]

[The time of Mr. MANN having expired, by unanimous consent his time was extended for five minutes.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to detain the committee at any length, but during the last few years, since I first made a point of order upon the proposition, I have gotten into the habit of making newspaper clippings with reference to some of our enterprises and duties abroad by our ambassadors and diplomatic representatives. I hold in my hand one which is typical, although I have others more entertaining. It is headed "Towers plan flower ball." This refers to an event in Berlin during the last few weeks. It reads as follows:

TOWERS PLAN FLOWER BALL—AMERICAN EMBASSY AT BERLIN BECOMES BOWER ON FEBRUARY 18.

[By wireless telegraph to the Washington Post.]

BERLIN, February 8, 1908.

Court and diplomatic society is looking forward with keen anticipation to the flower ball which will be given by Ambassador and Mrs. Tower at the American embassy on February 18. Over 500 invitations have been issued for the function, which promises to be one of the most beautiful that Berlin has ever seen.

The embassy, in the Koenig Platz, will be transformed for the occasion into a huge bower of spring blossoms, with artificial sunshine furnished by a unique use of incandescent lighting effects. Crown Prince Frederick William, with the princess; Prince Eitel-Frederick and his princess, and Prince Adalbert, the Kaiser's three grown-up sons, will all be present.

All the ladies will wear costumes representing various flowers, while the men will wear distinctive boutonnières. The ball will be the Towers's last elaborate entertainment for the court and diplomatic corps, and therefore will probably eclipse in splendor the long series of affairs which have taken place at the American embassy under their régime.

Is it for this class of people and this class of work that we propose to furnish foreign ambassadors with embassies abroad? What would the Towers do with the commonplace embassy which we would proceed to purchase? Could the Towers live in the same embassy that Doctor Hill could live in?

Mr. LANDIS. I will suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Indiana wishes to ask a question I will yield, but as for his making suggestions, I am able to make those myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANDIS. I never questioned the gentleman's ability to measure up to any situation to an elaborate degree, but I would ask the gentleman if this thought has not occurred to him—that the very bill which the gentleman from Ohio has introduced, providing for buildings for ambassadors, would not protect the American people against just such visitations in the newspapers as he has read?

Mr. MANN. Certainly not. Does the gentleman think the Towers would have lived in an embassy that the Government provided abroad?

Mr. LANDIS. Of course they would. We could compel them to do so.

Mr. MANN. You can not compel them.

Mr. LANDIS. I submit to the gentleman that we could by statute provide that the embassy building should be occupied by the ambassador.

Mr. MANN. You could provide a building for each Member of Congress that were identically alike and compel them to live in them, but you never will.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman inform the House whether or not our representatives, ambassadors, and ministers away back in the days of Whigs and Democrats were rich people or in moderate circumstances?

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt under the system now being most earnestly pressed upon us from every side, requiring that all campaign contributions, practically, shall be made by rich men, that forever, unless we provide against it, ambassadors will be rich men as a rule. [Applause.] It is one of those things that come that way. We have forbidden corporations to make campaign contributions, and, therefore, under every administration these ambassadorships, as a rule, have gone to men who have the means themselves or the means of getting from others large sums of money.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman indulge me with one more inquiry? I am merely after information.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought not to seek information from me.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman is one of the best sources in the House for information. Does not the gentleman think the Government of the United States should so fix the salaries that poor men with brains, genuine Americans with brains, could fill these places that seem to be filled now by only the very rich?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we all judge richness by comparison. I am serving in this House at a salary of $7,500 a year, living in a home in Washington, the most expensive city probably in the world in which to live, or one of the most, and doing my work fairly well, getting along without any difficulty so far as society is concerned, so far as department work is concerned, so far as dealing with the Government and executive officers is concerned, and so far as my position in this House is concerned, and I think I could do equally well on $17,500 a year, which we pay to our ambassadors. I do not know whether that answers the gentleman or not. And the gentleman himself is doing equally well, and he would represent the Government abroad with equal capacity with the salary that he is now receiving or even with a smaller salary. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman. I would not spend the Government's money in entertaining. I would attend to the public business, but I think that we should pay enough for a poor man to fill these places, instead of giving the jobs to the rich, because the rich only can meet the expenses.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, after having had his abilities and character so generally, and let me say so correctly certified, it is with some degree of embarrassment that I find myself in the position of differing from my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN]; but if he has a right conception of the purpose of the legislation which has been suggested, then I have an entirely erroneous conception of it. The very purpose, as was suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS], of the legislation is to avoid the possibility of absurd display by extravagantly rich men who are exploiting themselves socially instead of giving us the most efficient diplomatic representation abroad that we have a right to expect. I know of no suggestion from any gentleman favoring this project, or from any other, that the salaries of ambassadors should be increased. The purpose, so far as I know—and certainly it is mine to the extent of my vote and influence—is to keep the salaries at the rates already fixed; but it is desirable, if my observation and experience count for anything, and if the testimony of 90 per cent of the people who have impartially observed and reported on this question is of any value, to fix a standard for ambassadors and ministers abroad so that the poorest man in the country, if he possess the ability and character, may go without humiliation in succession to an enormously rich representative and give to this Government official representation that every American citizen can be proud of. The salary is big enough, I think, but our experience in many of the great capitals in the world has shown that the minister or ambassador, whatever his rank, can not live in the way that, despite the opinion of gentlemen to the contrary, he is compelled to live, and save a penny for his family, and in most cases they live beyond the compensation given them by the Government. That is a condition that we ought to correct. We hope that never again in the history of this country will it occur that the mere displacing of a wealthy ambassador by a highly trained diplomat will cause such a disturbance that it will disturb the political fabric of two great governments. The purpose of the legislation is to equalize, to level, to make more democratic the representation that we have abroad, and I believe that the House and I am convinced that the country will sustain such legislation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to make one observation, and that is on the question of compensation or salaries. It has never been the policy of this Government from the time we framed the Constitution for its public officers to work for the public without compensation. That question was thoroughly thrashed out in the great convention which framed our Constitution. Wealth has accumulated in this country. If we do not fix salaries so that a poor man can come to Congress, either the House or the Senate, or, if you please, if we do not fix the salary of the President of the United States so that a poor man can come here and be put upon a parity with others—I do not mean socially, because a gentleman is a gentleman whether poor or rich—if we do away with the salary of the office of either President or Congressman and fail to give them sufficient to defray their expenses, then we will turn this Congress over to the millionaires of this country. The poor people would stay at home, because they could not come here and undertake the heavy expenses that they have to undertake in this, the most expensive city, I think, in the world—certainly the most expensive in which I ever lived.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee one question. The British Parliament gives no pay to its members, does it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is what I am told.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And yet some of the most distinguished men who ever served in the British Parliament were as poor as Lazarus, among them Edmund Burke. Suppose we had that arrangement here. Do not you believe a constituency who have poor men they wanted to send would send them just as certain men of the British Parliament are kept there; for instance, the Irish members who get a salary, which they do not derive from the Government, but the people make it up and pay them, and the laboring members, too. Do you believe if we did not draw any salary here that there would not be anybody in this House but rich men?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I mean to say there would be more millionaires in Congress if we had the English system. The rich are mostly elected to Parliament, and a few laboring men. It came out in the great debate——

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Is not the very purpose of having the British Parliament without a salary in order that the Government of that country may be as far as possible confined to the landed aristocracy of the country who can afford to serve without pay?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia a question. Is it not true, notwithstanding that declaration now, that a very large percentage of the present House of Commons are as poor as the average man here?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No, sir; I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. It is true that a very large percentage of the British Parliament, as I understand it, are men of very little means, and it is also true that their constituency makes up a fund for them, but it does seem to me that the democratic principle is that of compensation, rather than of having a majority of the persons those who are able to serve without compensation and having others known as a poor class of people for whom the hat is passed among their constituents.

Mr. BRUMM. As objects of charity.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Here is the point I want to make. I want to say in answer to my friend from Missouri that the labor members of Parliament to-day are poor, their constituents are paying their salary and some of this money our people contribute. I have a great—just a moment, Mr. Chairman, I ask the Chair to give me a minute, because most of my time has been taken up by questions. I am for the labor set, the intermediate set. The rich men take care of themselves. I say, and I maintain it here, and if I were in Parliament I would maintain it, that the country is safest which gives a reasonable compensation to its public servants, so that the poor man with brains and heart and Americanism can come in and fill the high places here, places that I believe if filled by the very rich they would legislate for the very rich and not for the great body of the people, the gravel train upon which I have traveled most of my life. [Loud applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Secretary of legation to Salvador and consul-general to San Salvador, $2,000; and the words "San Salvador" in the consular reorganization act of April 5, 1896, are hereby repealed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order, I would like to know what the purpose is in repealing the words "San Salvador." Was not this all covered by the consular act?

Mr. COUSINS. No; the occasion for that is the fact that we have a consul-general at the city of San Salvador. By this bill he will be superseded by a secretary of legation, who will perform all the duties, at a saving to the Government of $1,500, his salary being but $2,000.

Mr. MANN. This merely combines a secretary of legation and consul-general?

Mr. COUSINS. Precisely.

Mr. MANN. Are they both there now?

Mr. COUSINS. When this bill goes into effect they will be.

Mr. MANN. Are they both there now?

Mr. COUSINS. No; the secretary is not there now. The minute the secretary goes the other will go out.

Mr. MANN. Was not this covered in the consular reorganization act?

Mr. COUSINS. No.

Mr. MANN. It was claimed we had all consular places——

Mr. COUSINS. Well, the consular readjustment bill is not yet passed; it is in conference.

Mr. MANN. It passed two years ago.

Mr. COUSINS. You mean the old one—the reorganization bill?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COUSINS. It was not covered in that.

Mr. MANN. Then, an erroneous statement was made about the bill about the time it was considered on the floor. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Secretary of legation to Persia, who shall be an American student of the language of that country, and shall be allowed and required, under the direction of the Secretary of State, to devote his time to the acquisition of the Persian language, $2,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph. I noticed in the bill that in the first place you require that the secretary of legation shall be an American student of the language. The same is true as to the item of second secretary of embassy to Turkey, but when you get over further, to the third secretary of the embassy to Japan and the third secretary of the embassy to Turkey, you only require them to be students, in the first place, of the Japanese language, and, in the second, of the Turkish language. Do you not have a provision in here requiring all these secretaries to be American citizens?

Mr. COUSINS. All of what?

Mr. MANN. All of these secretaries to be American citizens?

Mr. COUSINS. They are all American citizens.

Mr. MANN. Why do you make a distinction between the second secretary, an American student, and the third secretary, a mere student?

Mr. COUSINS. In the case of Japan and China we have student interpreters.

Mr. MANN. I am not speaking of the student interpreters. At the bottom of page 4, for instance, it says: "Second secretary of embassy to Turkey, who shall be an American student," and on page 5 is the third secretary to Turkey, "who shall be a student of the Turkish language." Is there any reason for a fine-haired distinction, and is it a fine-haired distinction?

Mr. LANDIS. It is merely the verbiage that has been used. They are American citizens and they are students of the language.

Mr. MANN. In one case you say "American student," and in another mere "student." That is a distinction I could not understand in view of the fact that they are required to be American citizens. Now, in the distinction which is made, you require the secretary of legation to Persia shall be allowed and required, with the direction of the Secretary of State, to devote his time to the acquisition of the Persian language. Do you propose to have him do anything else?

Mr. COUSINS. Yes; they all have to.

Mr. MANN. This requires him to devote his time to that. He has no time for anything else.

Mr. COUSINS. That was by the direction of the Secretary.

Mr. MANN. That is only the method. The law requires him to devote his time to studying the language.

Mr. COUSINS. No; it is in the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that paragraph, commencing with line 13, as follows:

And shall be allowed and required, under the direction of the Secretary of State, to devote his time to the acquisition of the Persian language.

Mr. COUSINS. What amendment is that? Do you wish to amend by saying "a portion of his time?"

Mr. MANN. I made the point of order on that portion of the paragraph.

Mr. COUSINS. Do you wish to say he shall devote a portion of his time to the study of the language? If so, there will be no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. The Secretary of State now has authority to direct him to spend a portion of his time studying the language, and you provide that he shall be a student of the language, but here you propose to require him to devote all of his time.

Mr. COUSINS. No; it is in the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is, under that provision. They may construe it that way.

Mr. COUSINS. I would be perfectly willing to accept an amendment that he devote such portion of his time as may be possible to the study of the language.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes a point of order against the language in lines 13 to 16. It is undoubtedly legislation.

Mr. MANN. Did the Chair get the language that I made the point of order against?

The CHAIRMAN. From the word "and," in line 13, down to——

Mr. MANN. The word "language," in line 16.

The CHAIRMAN. In line 16. It is undoubtedly legislation. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to read just one paragraph of the record of the House on the salary matter, to which reference was made a few moments ago. It will take but a minute or two. I am now reading from the RECORD of January 23, 1907, from a historian, Senator LODGE, and Senator TILLMAN, both of whom voted for the measure raising Congressional salaries. Senator LODGE said:

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is usually so accurate that I dislike to question his statement, but unless I am very much mistaken, since the last election and the entry into Parliament of a very large number of representatives of labor unions, or what are known as the "working classes," I recall having seen in some paper a statement that Parliament has passed a law giving salaries for the first time in the history of their Parliament. I may be mistaken. It may have been merely introduced and not passed.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator, I am certain, is mistaken. No such act has passed.

The English system came down from the time when the House of Commons was made up almost exclusively of landowners, men of considerable income. In later times poor men have entered the House of Commons, notably among the Irish members, and many of the Irish members in the house have been paid by contributions from their own countrymen and from their sympathizers in this country. Now, they have a large number of labor members, and those men are at this moment paid, unless I am greatly misinformed, by contributions of their labor unions.

That seems to me the worst possible system, and it is bound to come in any representative government where there is a large democratic representation, because otherwise poor men can not serve in the representative bodies, and I think we shall find that England will perceive under present conditions the mistake that has been made and will come to the system of paying.

We have always paid in common with all the other representative bodies, and it seems to me perfectly plain that what we want to do and what we should aim at doing is to pay to Senators and Representatives a salary which will enable them to live becomingly, in accordance with the great position of trust which they hold, which may relieve them, if they desire to be relieved, of the effort to make money in other ways.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is right along the line of the discussion had a few moments ago by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES]—that is, that the British Parliament is made up of landowners, what we might call "millionaires," and that that policy is kept up on purpose so as to keep the titled crowd or the very rich in power to make the laws of that country. It has gone to such an extent that the labor unions say, "We will pay our own men a salary out of our pockets rather than not be represented at all in Parliament," and some of the money thus used comes from the United States. Now, I say if we did not pay our Members of Congress and other officers of this Government a just compensation, that sooner or later the millionaires and landowners would have charge of Congress, and then the great middle class or the very poor would have but few champions in this great body.

For that very reason, for that very identical reason and a few others, the framers of the Constitution in 1787 said Members of Congress must be paid a compensation to be fixed by Congress. Hence it is, Mr. Chairman, that I take the floor just now to speak in behalf of the poorer-class people of this country, who have brains, but who have not wealth, but who have love of country and the legal right and the inherent right, you may say, to be Members of Congress, but who are too poor to be in or remain in Congress. Let proper salaries be paid so they can, and be thus placed on a parity with the richer class. By this means the selfish rich will never run this country; at all all events not very long.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the British Parliament responds more readily to the will of the people than this House responds to the will of this country?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; I think it does. I have been for years trying to keep up with what this House does, but in England they have a way of forcing a response to the will of the country? But who, after all, writes the law? The landowners and rich and the titled set.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman if he will be willing to state at this time the fact that they have a ministry over there that the cabinet officers respond much more readily to the will of the Parliament than they do over here? [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, yes. We should have a complex Congress, composed of all classes of good society. Give the middle class a chance, whether they are as poor as Lazarus or not; they will make as good lawmakers as the very rich, and better by far. Take the middle class and, as a rule, they make the best lawmakers. Make it sure that they have an equal chance. That is the principle I am speaking for.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second secretary of embassy to Turkey, who shall be an American student of the language of that court and country, and shall be allowed and required, under the direction of the Secretary of State, to devote his time to the acquisition of the Turkish language, $2,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to the language on page 5, commencing with the word "and" in line 1 down to and including the word "language" on line 3.

Mr. COUSINS. I will say to the gentleman that that is the existing law and has been for a good many years and is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is subject to the point of order unless it is the provision of a statute, and I am sure it has not been there for years.

Mr. COUSINS. I have no personal objection to its going out if the gentleman wishes it to go out. But I think it leaves it for greater security in the administration of the position.

Mr. MANN. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Third secretary of embassy to Japan, who shall be a student of the Japanese language, $1,200.

Third secretary of embassy to Turkey, who shall be a student of the Turkish language, $1,200.

Mr. MANN. For the third secretary of embassy to Japan why not put in "who shall be an American student?" Why should that provision not be made?

Mr. COUSINS. They are Americans.

Mr. MANN. But you have left out "American." Is there any reason for that?

Mr. COUSINS. You would like to insert the word "American" before the word "student?"

Mr. MANN. It is done in the other two cases; I do not see why it should not be inserted in here.

Mr. COUSINS. Very well. You want to put in the word "American?"

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COUSINS. Very well, we will accept that.

Mr. MANN. I move to amend by inserting before the word "student," in line 10, the word "American," and in line 13.

The Clerk reads as follows:

Page 5, lines 9 and 12, strike out the words "a" and insert before "student" in each case the word "an American."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

TRANSPORTATION OF DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR OFFICERS IN GOING TO AND RETURNING FROM THEIR POSTS.

To pay the cost of the transportation of diplomatic and consular officers in going to and returning from their posts, or when traveling under the orders of the Secretary of State, at the rate of 5 cents per mile, but not including any expense incurred in connection with leaves of absence, to continue available during the fiscal year 1909, so much as may be needed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I do not know just what the effect of this provision is, but I wish to ask if it is customary to make an appropriation without regard to the amount.

Mr. COUSINS. There are certain items that can not be determined, and this is one of them. There are certain items in this and other appropriation bills that employ the language "so much as may be needed."

Mr. MANN. This is the first time I have ever seen it.

Mr. COUSINS. There are several others. The gentleman will see the reason for it. It is definitely known and ruled upon by the Comptroller as to who are the officers entitled to 5 cents a mile. In the last session it was not determined how much would be needed, and the general appropriation bills carried part of this mileage. We carried part of it, so that you can see it is impossible for us to know exactly how much would be required; but not one cent more——

Mr. MANN. That is the case with nearly all appropriations. You can not tell exactly how much will be required, but we have a method of making deficiency appropriations when the amount appropriated is not sufficient. That is the very purpose——

Mr. COUSINS. This is absolutely fixed by law, so that not one cent more than they are entitled to can be had.

Mr. MANN. Well, but Congress is entitled to know how much it is appropriating for these things. That is the very purpose of making an appropriation.

Mr. COUSINS. Last year it amounted to about $41,000. We can not tell just how much traveling will be required from year to year. The service is growing.

Mr. MANN. Take the Post-Office Department. We have just made an appropriation of over $200,000,000. Nearly every item in it is fixed by law. They can not tell exactly how much it will be. If the appropriation is not needed, it is not expended. If it is too small, then an application comes in for a deficiency appropriation, and the same would be true to a large extent of various measures, that it is impossible to tell absolutely the amount in advance, and yet we ought to have knowledge of the appropriation, and I think the gentleman should put in the amount. I think it is subject to a point of order anyhow.

Mr. COUSINS. I will show the gentleman one such instance in this bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, I will not say you have not got instances in this bill.

Mr. COUSINS. The gentleman says he knows of no instance in any appropriation. If he will look back on page 5, line 25, he will find the language, under section 1740 of the Revised Statutes, "so much as may be necessary for the fiscal year."

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Illinois, in relation to the post-office service, there is a certain amount of business that has to be done by special agents, and experience shows about how much that may be from year to year. These traveling expenses depend for their amount upon the number of vacancies that may occur in diplomatic and consular positions. There may not be two in the next fiscal year, and, on the other hand, there may be two hundred. There is no uniformity in the business, and it would seem to me that it would be a mere guess, and the wildest kind of a guess, to undertake to fix the amount.

Mr. MANN. I dare say the amount runs about the same from year to year.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I undertake to say that it does not.

Mr. MANN. I undertake to say that it does, and neither the gentleman nor myself knows anything about it, and we will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] which one of us is right.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Allow me to suggest that at the beginning of a new administration there are a great many changes, and there should be a large appropriation for traveling expenses.

Mr. SLAYDEN. We will attend to that next year. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. If it is the expectation that the next Republican President or the next Democratic President is going to change these diplomatic officers, that might be a good reason, although I should hope——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It illustrates that there is no uniformity in the number of resignations or vacancies in either the diplomatic or consular service—no uniformity year by year.

Mr. MANN. Well, the fact of the matter is that in the diplomatic and consular service, as elsewhere, there are few deaths and fewer resignations.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Occasionally one is recalled.

Mr. MANN. Occasionally one is recalled as ambassador; not often in other places. Occasionally the obligation to the man who has been appointed has expired, and, that being so, they recall him and put in another to whom obligations have been incurred.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order, in view of the contingencies of next year.

The Clerk read as follows:

BRINGING HOME CRIMINALS.

Actual expenses incurred in bringing home from foreign countries persons charged with crime, $7,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not mean to suggest that the article I shall ask the Clerk to read is entirely pertinent to this particular paragraph, although it is not so much of a misfit as some people might think. A few weeks ago the moral sense of the country was shocked by seeing an advertisement in a New York paper of the sale of works of art that had been accumulated in foreign countries that were frankly labeled as "loot." The account of that sale, the extraordinary nature of the collection, its marvelous beauty, and its royal origin is set forth so clearly, so strongly, in that article that I ask the Clerk as a matter of general interest to read it to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

LOOT AT AUCTION.

"How," said a prominent foreigner in a New York club on Saturday, "would you Americans feel if, ten years after a Chinese raid on Washington, you heard of a Peking auction sale at which were offered many of the treasures of the White House and the finest residences of your capital?" The question was called forth by the sale this week at auction of what is described as "antique and modern Chinese porcelains, enamels, brasses, bronzes, jades, ivory carvings, lacquers, Buddhas, ancient weapons, a great number of imperial and mandarin robes, original rolls of rich silk and gold brocades which were made for the imperial household; beautiful embroideries and palace hangings, etc., all collected prior to and after the siege of the legations in Peking in 1900 by the widow of the American minister to China during the Boxer rebellion." It is admitted to be a marvelous collection, in point of artistic value and the variety of the items which it comprises. But ought not Americans to blush for shame that the proceeds of wholesale plunder can be offered for sale so frankly?

Let us at once disclaim the slightest intention of insinuating that the present owner, or her personal representatives or relatives, had any hand in the looting of the imperial palace which went on in Peking in the name of humanity and Christianity and civilization. We have every reason to believe the statement in yesterday's Sun that this collection is "not the slow aggregation of years of indulgence in the collector's hobby, but represents the timely purchases of a practical woman with a taste for the beautiful, who found herself at an unlooked-for emergency in an exceptionally favorable position to obtain objects in which all the world is interested." As we understand it, after the relief of the legations and the solemn march through the imperial palace Peking abounded in loot. The vandals not only wore, in some cases, American uniforms; they wore those of every Western nation represented in the bloody column which marched up from Tientsin, killing and burning all the way. Our own troops, we believe, were the least of the offenders, and beyond doubt many Boxers and Chinese criminals, patterning after the invaders, helped to carry on the plundering, which spared no mandarin's or rich man's dwelling that offered an opportunity for easy burglary. At the trial of a German officer a couple of years ago it was officially charged that he made a practice, when off duty, of raiding with a couple of attendants and a ladder, and that he was not at all particular against which house he placed that ladder. Now, the private soldiers who picked up odds and ends speedily found that there were definite limits to their knapsacks, and, like the Chinese thieves, they became aware that they had a fine opportunity to sell to practical men and women "with a taste for the beautiful" and ready to take advantage of the "exceptionally favorable position" in which they found themselves.

The dealing was either directly with the thieves themselves or with the receivers of stolen goods. The "fence," the professional go-between for robbers and customers, was thus exalted by international indorsement to a height of respectability and usefulness never before occupied. And the American minister's wife was not the only American to take advantage of the exceptional advantages. There was our own precious Lieut. Col. Littleton W. T. Waller, of the Marine Corps—to cite one example—who was subsequently tried for the gentle pastime of putting to death in cold blood a dozen or so natives of Samar who had carried his baggage across the island. This the court attributed to temporary derangement; but no such allegation will be made, we believe, when it comes to appraising the value of the two carloads of relics of the Boxer rebellion which followed Colonel Waller to this country. They have not yet been placed on sale; but we violate no confidence when we state that connoisseurs the world over are hoping they will be at no distant day. The wife of the American minister had, however, one great advantage over all others. She was able to bring her carefully selected loot into this country free of duty.

We regret that we have not space to dwell at length upon the exceptional articles in this collection. We can merely call attention to one or two choice bargains:

Among the curious things are two small silver canisters of fine Pekoe tea which was put up for the Emperor's use. They were taken from the imperial palace. * * * In the gallery, where are hung robes and the rolls of rare silk (from the imperial palace), the eye can revel in color from the stunning imperial yellow and wonderfully rich vermilion to the quietest of neutral tones. And over in the corner is a robe made for a Mandarin baby, which sets the hearts of the women visitors to the gallery a-flutter.

Plainly, not since Napoleon's Old Guard ravaged Europe has there been afforded to plain citizens such an opportunity to acquire the possessions of an emperor and his court. We trust, of course, that no one will accuse us of any sympathy for the heathen who were robbed. Doubtless the baby's robe is so fine because the Mandarin, her father, ground the cost thereof out of the peasants he ruled. And, then, probably the Chinese did not appreciate what they had; if they still resent being robbed—why, so much the worse for them! What we are particularly concerned with just now is the honor of our own country, and we confess to a certain feeling—old-fashioned, if you please—for the reputation and standing of our diplomatic corps. Is there no generous and wealthy American ready to rival Mr. Morgan for the speed and the honor which marked his return of the famous Cope of Ascoli as soon as he became aware that he was the innocent possessor of stolen goods? If there is, we can think of no finer opportunity to demonstrate the innate courtliness and honesty of the American people, no more delicate act of international comity, than for him to acquire the stolen property of the Imperial family of China, and ship it back with the compliments of the whole people. The Washington Government has no funds to do this; otherwise, we are sure the President's devotion to honesty, public and private, would induce him to step forward before anyone else.

[During the reading of the article the time of Mr. SLAYDEN expired, and by unanimous consent his time was extended five minutes.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the newspaper accounts of that sale from day to day made some mighty interesting reading. It was particularly observed by the reporters, and the benefit of their observations given to the country, that the fact that the greater part of this plunder was stolen from the royal palaces, that these rich robes of silk and interesting examples of the art of the goldsmith and silversmith came from the royal family, did not in any way lessen the desire of the simple Republican patrons of the auction to possess them.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that if we had owned a Government building over there for the minister it would have made any appreciable difference in the amount of property he had stolen?

Mr. PERKINS. I do.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am sure that if we had a legation there the minister would have been less tempted.

Mr. MANN. Then the purpose of the Government buildings is to affect the moral sense and sensibilities of our ministers abroad?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It might help to put Satan, in the shape of temptation, behind him.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman will yield, did it not occur to the gentleman that this newspaper article was simply a bunco advertisement to sell goods upon a reputation that did not exist?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that I have personally conversed with a great many gentlemen who were in China at the time, and who have assured me that the most shameless robbery of the imperial palace occurred. They did not go themselves, perhaps, to plunder this royal residence, but being scrupulously honest they only traded with the thieves. [Laughter.] They became the fence to help the soldier who had less conscience to dispose of the plunder he had accummulated during that expedition. The missionaries in China must find it very difficult at times to explain to the heathen the conduct of Christian nations.

The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALLOWANCE TO WIDOWS OR HEIRS OF DIPLOMATIC OFFICERS WHO DIE ABROAD.

Payment, under the provisions of section 1749 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to the widows or heirs at law of diplomatic or consular officers of the United States dying in foreign countries in the discharge of their duties, $5,000.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the word "dollars," at the end of line 4, page 11, the following: "And to Clara A. Carter, widow of Martin J. Carter, late consul of the United States at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, who died at his post of duty on the 9th day of October, 1905, the sum of $861.11, being the balance of one year's salary."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a brief statement. Martin Carter was consul at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, appointed in 1901, at a salary of $1,500 a year, which in 1904 was increased to $2,000 a year. In October, 1905, he died very suddenly. He and his wife were living at Yarmouth, and before he had been able to make up his expense account for that quarter his death occurred. The widow finally made up the account, and in settling with the Government was unable to state clearly and collect the compensation for the expenses to which she was really entitled. I called upon the State Department for a report of this case and for the precedents, and in order to get the matter clearly before the House I will ask the Clerk to read the reply of the Secretary of State to my letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 14, 1908.

Hon. ALLEN F. COOPER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st instant, and in reply to inform you that Mr. Martin J. Carter was appointed American consul at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, March 8, 1901. He took the oath of office March 14, 1901, on which date his salary began. At the time of his appointment the salary of the Yarmouth office was $1,500. It was raised to $2,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904. Mr. Carter served as consul at Yarmouth until his death, October 9, 1905. Consuls are not commissioned for any specified term, but hold their positions during the pleasure of the President. The law provides for the payment to a widow or heirs at law of a consul who dies at his post a sum of money equal to the allowance made to such officer for the transit period between his post and Washington, which in the case of Yarmouth is six days. It also provides for the payment of the expenses of the transportation to their former homes in this country and the interment there of the remains of consuls who die abroad. The law makes no provision for any other payment in the case of deceased consuls than those above named. Under date of the 8th instant, the Auditor for the State and other Departments reported "that $33.33 was paid to Mrs. Carter on account of allowance to widows or heirs of diplomatic officers who die abroad, in accordance with section 1749, Revised Statutes, and also the amount that was found due her late husband in the final settlement of his accounts of $260.77, which amount was remitted to her as administratrix of the estate."

By reference to Senate Report 238, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, you will find a list of diplomatic officers who have died in the service and whose families have received various sums from six months' salary to one year's compensation. Since then Congress has provided for Mrs. Verona E. Pollock, widow of Alexander L. Pollock, who died while consul of the United States at San Salvador, the sum of $6,480, which included a claim for the loss of private property and her late husband's compensation. (See 30 Stat. L., p. 1489.)

Congress also provided an act approved April 17, 1900 (Stat. L., 1899–1900, p. 29), for the payment to Mrs. Clare M. Ashby, widow of William W. Ashby, who was drowned while consul of the United States at Colon, the sum of $2,866, which represented the balance of one year's salary.

Again, by act approved March 3, 1901 (Stat. L., 1900–1901, p. 1011), Congress provided for the payment to Ella Lowery Moseley, widow of Robert E. Moseley, who died while consul-general at Singapore, a sum equal to three months' salary, or $750.

Also, by an act approved February 6, 1903 (Stat. L., 1901–1903, p. 1606), Congress provided for the payment of an allowance to the widow of W. W. Cobb, who died while consul of the United States at Colon, of $1,755.49, the balance of her husband's salary for the year of his death.

These are the only cases of payment of this nature provided by Congress to widows of consular officers which the Department recalls at present.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

ROBERT BACON,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the Cobb case was in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and here is a report giving a list of cases of similar character that have been allowed, and there is also a case in the Fifty-sixth and one in the Fifty-fifth Congress and some cases cited in this report of the Forty-ninth Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Are not the cases that the gentleman refers to Private Calendar claims, passed by special bills in Congress?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that some of these cases were reported from the Committee on Claims and some private bills from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but I take it that it does not make any difference in what form they get before the House if they have merit, so that the House understands the merit of these bills. I call the gentleman's attention further to the fact that I introduced a bill that was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and by that committee has been referred to a subcommittee, and the members of that subcommittee, so far as they are present, are unanimously in favor of it and are ready to report the bill.

Mr. MANN. But they have not reported it, and even if they had it would not have passed.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. They will report it.

Mr. MANN. What is the amount that the gentleman puts in this claim?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Eight hundred and sixty-one dollars and eleven cents, being the balance of a year's salary.

Mr. MANN. How much salary does it represent?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. A little over five months.

Mr. MANN. On what basis does the gentleman wish us to pay the balance of a year's salary to a man when there is no fixed tenure of office?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. The salary is for $2,000 a year. The balance of the year was over five months, and, figured up in proportion at that rate, I reach this sum that I ask for.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the consul, instead of dying at the end of the fifth month, died at the end of the tenth, what then?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I would have asked for the balance of the year.

Mr. MANN. Suppose he had died at the end of the first month of the year, would the gentleman still have asked for the balance of the year?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I think I would.

Mr. MANN. On what basis does the gentleman propose to make that distinction between the widows of consuls?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. There is no distinction between the widows of consuls for this reason—that these precedents show that in every instance, no matter how much of the year was left, the widow was paid for the balance of the year's salary, and the gentleman knows that with the employees of this House it has been frequently the custom to allow for the salary of the deceased to the end of the year. I want to call the gentleman's attention to a statement the widow makes to me. I asked for a statement, and she wrote me the following letter:

Hon. A. F. COOPER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our conversation concerning the bill you are about to introduce in my behalf, Mr. Carter made several business trips to Boston in the interest of the Government to prevent a lawsuit, each time being obliged to remain there several days. His sudden death prevented his recording this expense.

The week following Mr. Carter's death I was informed that his successor would arrive in a short time to take charge of the office. In order to vacate I was obliged to call in an auctioneer, who disposed of my furniture at a great sacrifice. I was compelled to pay the rent from October to January 1, 1905, as Mr. Creevy did not bring his family until January 1.

Very respectfully,

CLARA A. CARTER.

I want to say to the gentleman that this consul's salary was practically the only income the man had for himself and his family and his death was very sudden. He died after about twenty minutes of sickness. His widow was stricken, almost prostrated, and has never recovered from the shock. She needs a little support, and I am asking for a small amount. There is a long line of precedents for this case, and I ask the gentleman if in his heart he can not see his way clear to let this go through.

Mr. MANN. I asked the gentleman for precedents and he has not given me a single one. I asked the gentleman whether any such item has ever been put into a diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, or rather, whether these were not private bills. The gentleman has not stated a single instance.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman, in reply, whether it makes any difference if this goes into a diplomatic and consular appropriation bill or whether it goes into a general appropriation bill, the sundry civil, or some private bill.

Mr. MANN. I think it makes a great deal of difference whether a claim of this sort is considered by the Committee on Claims, which has jurisdiction of the matter, or whether it should be considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which has no jurisdiction, by the way. And if the gentleman's bill was reported, it would not be considered, because that committee has no jurisdiction.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that the same question of the point of order would still be applicable if this came in the sundry civil bill or any other appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. But that committee has no jurisdiction over the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. The House has passed them all the same.

Mr. MANN. All of those items which have come in the sundry civil bill have been inserted by a body where they put in anything at anybody's request.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman if he thinks it is more important to stand upon some mere technicality than it is to do justice.

Mr. MANN. I think it is important to stand upon technicalities, but the gentleman is not seeking justice. What he is seeking is favoritism. The gentleman does not undertake to say, I apprehend, if any employee of the Government dies, the mere fact that he was poor is a reason for paying his family a——

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I have called your attention to the facts——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Now, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that, as stated by the letter from the widow, he made two or three trips to Boston the last quarter, for which he never received any compensation either in the way of pay or expense account. He died suddenly of heart disease, and I understand he died within twenty minutes of the time after he was stricken. She knew nothing about his expenses, and consequently could not render any account. She said that she was compelled to dispose of her property at a sacrifice, and, outside of the gentleman's claim of favoritism, I submit if there is not some question of equity and justice that is due when we consider all the circumstances of the case, and I ask my friend if he will not be considerate enough to withdraw the point of order and allow this claim to pass?

Mr. DENBY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. DENBY. As a question with regard to the subcommittee has been raised, I am on that subcommittee and I wish to state to the gentleman from Illinois and the committee that the two members of the three who were present when the bill was presented favored its being reported with a favorable recommendation, but they did not recommend it, because of the absence of the third member. We are convinced that the bill is a meritorious bill and it makes a strong appeal to the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee who have examined it. I know it is subject to the point of order, but I also know that similar bills have in times past been reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs and have been passed by the House.

Mr. MANN. The bills the gentleman refers to came from the Committee on Claims and under the rules the Committee on Foreign Affairs has not jurisdiction of such a bill.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Not all of them.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, the bills——

Mr. DENBY. The bill I refer to was before the Committee on Foreign Affairs and was considered by the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Take the case reported to the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs——

Mr. MANN. I was not criticising the Committee on Foreign Affairs for considering a bill referred to them, although if they would read the rules more carefully on the subject, instead of considering it they would have asked to have it sent, under the rules, to the committee having jurisdiction of the subject—that is, the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DENBY. We are not all as well informed as the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will take the trouble to read the rules——

Mr. PERKINS. So many bills belonging to our committee are stolen from us that we take anything that comes in.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would not object to a bill, possibly, which made provision for the payment of widows of consuls, but I have always considered that it as a species of favoritism which provides for payment of money to one person and not to another, unless there is an absolute precedent in the case, but, notwithstanding the desire to help my friend from Pennsylvania, whose earnestness and solicitude deserves better treatment, I am not willing to establish upon this bill a precedent that anyone on the floor of the House may offer for consideration in the Committee of the Whole House a claim pure and simple and have it inserted in the bill. I think I will have to insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL BUREAU AT BRUSSELS FOR REPRESSION OF THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

To meet the share of the United States in the expenses of the special bureau created by article 82 of the general act concluded at Brussels July 2, 1890, for the repression of the African slave trade and the restriction of the importation into and sale in a certain defined zone of the African continent of firearms, ammunition, and spirituous liquors, for the year 1909, $100.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This section of the bill makes appropriation to continue our share of a bureau established by the International Anti-Slavery Convention held at Brussels in 1890.

The newspapers a few weeks ago reported that the Secretary of State had sent a very sharp letter of admonition to the King of the Belgians about his management of the Kongo Free State. This is reversing the former policy of the State Department, and the very words of the Secretary himself in the letter he wrote to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DENBY] on this subject in 1906. He said in that letter:

We are parties to a general act for the suppression of the slave trade and the regulation of the firearms and liquor traffics in Central Africa, but that act relegates and confines all power and functions to those ends to the several powers having possessions or spheres of influence in Africa. The United States has neither, and its participation in the general act was on the distinct understanding that we had no territorial or administrative interest in that quarter. Our only potential function is in relation to the search and capture of slave vessels within certain waters of the African coast, and no occasion has arisen to exercise that function.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I sincerely deprecate the action of the Secretary of State in response to a misguided clamor on the subject of the Kongo, in writing a letter to the King of the Belgians in relation to the internal affairs of the Kongo Free State.

Let us see what is the condition of affairs in the Kongo State. Charges of cruelty by officials against the inhabitants of the Kongo Free State have had circulation through the newspapers in this country during the last few years. This was promptly investigated by a commission appointed for the purpose, and by a number of independent travelers, and the general consensus of opinion now is that the Belgians never were responsible for any of the atrocities alleged in the Kongo Free State, and that the mutilations cited as examples of those atrocities were committed by different native tribes upon one another, and were common in Uganda and the British possessions as well as in the French Kongo. Thereupon when it became evident that the Belgians are doing their best to stop these atrocities of the natives one upon another the agitations about cruelties in the Kongo ceased, and in its place there has been taken up an agitation against an alleged condition of slavery now supposed to exist in the Kongo Free State.

In a few words I wish to touch upon the injustice of such an agitation. The King of the Belgians, in response to an appeal by Pope Leo XIII, entered upon the undertaking, single-handed, of extirpating the Arab slave trade in Central Africa, which was carrying off and enslaving and killing about a hundred thousand natives in that region a year. The King of the Belgians furnished the means and money and men to fight the Arab slave traders and drive them out of Africa, and succeeded in accomplishing what other nations had regarded as almost impossible. Ever since that day in the Kongo Free State an attempt has been made by the Belgians to do away with the domestic institution of slavery, which always existed throughout Central Africa among the natives, one tribe enslaving another.

Now, let us see where this agitation comes from. It is the result of a propaganda from Great Britain, and the situation can best be summed up in the words of Cardinal Gibbons, who says that England (not referring to the country by name) "is playing the rôle that King Ahab enacted toward Naboth," where you remember, he coveted his neighbor's vineyard and finally got it. England covets the Kongo Free State.

A few years ago we had allegations of internal maladministration in Egypt. The result was a war and then the internationalization of Egypt, which, in other words, is an English province to-day. Then we heard allegations by English of mismanagement of affairs in the Orange Free State and Transvaal. The net result was a war and the acquisition by England of those two countries. Now, if you will look at the map of Africa, you will see that Cecil Rhodes's cherished project of a Cape-to-Cairo railway, from Cape Town to Cairo, must go through the territory either of the Congo Free States or of German East Africa.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection, [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRISON. Germany is a strong power, and England naturally will not dare to advance her railway line through——

Mr. PERKINS. Could not that railway pass through the sphere that is under English influence without passing through either the Congo Free State or the——

Mr. HARRISON. It could not. If the gentleman will look at the map he will see that the sphere of English influence is north, at Victoria Nyanza, and abutting upon English possessions in Egypt.

Mr. PERKINS. I had always understood that it was to the east and south of Nyassa.

Mr. HARRISON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it is not. Their object in getting control of the Kongo Free State is to build a great railroad the length of the continent entirely in English territory. That is one of the motives in this campaign against the Kongo. Another is that Antwerp has replaced Liverpool as the center of the rubber trade of the world.

Now, I have given you the motives that are actuating the English cabinet in this affair. What I object to is our Secretary of State being misled by this clamor, stirred up by only about 25 English missionaries out of some 600 missionaries down there, who are advancing the splendid work of humanity in Central Africa. I object to the English inducing our Secretary to jump into this clamor and attack King Leopold and thereby try to pull the chestnuts out of the fire for England. The English people can take care of their own affairs.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. Is it not a fact that some American missionaries have complained also?

Mr. HARRISON. That is true; but, by investigation, the complaint made by American missionaries is shown to be groundless.

Mr. FINLEY. I understood the gentleman a moment ago to speak of domestic slavery. Does he mean human slavery?

Mr. HARRISON. Domestic human slavery of negroes by other negroes. It is common in Africa, and has been in all the provinces of Africa, so far as I know about the history of those races. The Belgians are trying to stop it.

Mr. FINLEY. This appropriation is the enormous sum of $100. How could that much money be utilized in any effective way to put down slavery in the Congo Free State or anywhere else?

Mr. HARRISON. I will inform the gentleman, and beg that he will then let me proceed. This $100 goes to the international bureau, located at Zanzibar, and the duty resting upon members is to send to the bureau information, if they have any, as to any condition of slavery existing in Africa.

Mr. FINLEY. It is a publicity bureau?

Mr. HARRISON. It is a publicity bureau. That is all. That is as far as it extends, and no further.

I sincerely regret the position taken this year by the Secretary of State in attacking the King of Belgium and thereby endangering the transference by the King of the royal domain in the Kongo Free State to Belgium. I object to the agitation started in England for selfish purposes, endeavoring to bring the Kongo Free State under English rule. I believe that the natives in the Kongo Free State are better off mentally, morally, and physically than they are in the adjoining territories of Uganda and Southern Nigeria, belonging to England.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit me, Is his statement to the effect that the agitation for the elimination of slavery in the Kongo Free State based upon fact?

Mr. HARRISON. No. The charges of atrocities and slavery by Belgian officials were originally made by Capt. Guy Burrows, the author of a book which he offered for sale to the Kongo officials, but they refused, as it was offered as a means of blackmail. The man was afterwards sued in the English courts for libel by the Belgian officials, and he was mulcted in damages. That was the beginning of a long agitation, carried on with unparalleled hypocrisy and self-interested motives.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman, who are the leading factors in this rubber enterprise over yonder in this country you are talking about?

Mr. HARRISON. Well, I do not know what is the purpose of the gentleman's question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has he never heard of the rubber trust? Has there been any agitation against them? Who are in that rubber trust?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has hit the nail exactly on the head. A lot of New Yorkers of national and international financial fame have gone over to this little black country and laid their long, hungry hands on these people's rubber rights and are proceeding, under some sort of seductive charm or compulsory process, to get control of the rubber industry over there.

It seems now that they are strong enough to cause England to join in the pursuit, and also strong enough to have the United States join in the enterprise. I am quite familiar with the newspaper reports of some twelve or fifteen months ago that stated that some of these greatest financiers of New York, that work underneath the earth and on top of the earth, on top of the waters, and wherever human beings or a camel can go or a donkey tip along and carry you, were working an enterprise of some sort to get hold of this rubber industry and had gobbled up the whole thing. It seems to me now, from the very highest authority, the gentleman from New York, that some English people have gone and joined in the gobbling. Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to blame anybody for making money legally and justly. England stepped in and stood behind her Cecil Rhodes, the gold hunter and Boer war maker. We should not in this country make a Cecil Rhodes nor stand behind any Cecil Rhodes for the purpose of going into any land, whether it be barren, beauteous, or bleak or not, and allow people to gobble up the rights of defenseless people, whether they are black or white, old or young. Protect the very humblest from rapacity. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL PRISON COMMISSION.

For subscription of the United States as an adhering member of the International Prison Commission, and the expenses of a commissioner, including preparation of reports, $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what work is still left for the International Prison Commission to do? How long have they been at it and about when will they probably be through with it?

Mr. COUSINS. It was provided for in the Fifty-fourth Congress. I think very likely we can do away with this matter in a couple of years, when the next report is made.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman inform us what was the original provision of law? Was there no limitation in it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is quite a pertinent question. Was there any limitation in the original act creating the commission?

Mr. COUSINS. There was no limitation.

Mr. MANN. What was the provision of the law?

Mr. COUSINS (reading):

The commission is a committee of the International Prison Congress, which is composed of commissioners from France, Italy, Switzerland, Denmark, Spain, the Netherlands, Russia, Austria, and the United States. The congress meets once in five years at the different capitals; the commission every alternate summer in Switzerland. The subscription to the commission is based upon the population of the countries represented, the share of the United States being $325. The money thus received is expended in the publication of monographs, reports, etc., which are sent to the governments in proportion to their subscription. Thus, of the $2,000 appropriated by Congress annually, $325 goes to the commission and the balance to the "expenses of the commissioner." The commissioner for a number of years has been Samuel J. Barrows, of New York, formerly of Boston.

Mr. MANN. He was formerly a Member of this House.

Mr. COUSINS. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that I have had in mind for a year or so a special inquiry into this, and very likely we may dispose of it next time.

Mr. MANN. Was it two years ago that that International Prison Congress met here?

Mr. COUSINS. I think not so recently.

Mr. LANDIS. That was the International Arbitration Congress.

Mr. MANN. No; the International Prison Congress.

Mr. COUSINS. There is to be another meeting in the near future. I forget whether it is next year or the following year. I feel satisfied that after that meeting we can dispense with it.

Mr. MANN. I do not believe you will dispense with it. What has been stated refreshes my recollection about it. They are engaged very largely in trying to get some uniformity in the matter of the erection and regulation of prisons. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. COUSINS. It has served a very useful purpose.

Mr. MANN. They have issued some useful reports.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not doubt that, but my purpose in asking the question is to call the attention of the House to this fact, that whenever one of these commissions is created it seems to continue indefinitely. Its work is hardly ever finished, and about the only way to put an end to one of them is to quit appropriating for it. We are getting to be very largely a government by commissions, and a commission once created is almost immortal. It seems to me that it would be well for the chairman to get the information he desires; to let the matter pass this time, but unless the commission can show some justification for itself, to fix or put an end to it in the next bill.

Mr. COUSINS. That meets with my approbation, and I intend to do that.

Mr. MANN. My impression is that as long as the appropriation is continued and Mr. Samuel J. Barrows is commissioner, he will not stop drawing the salary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know about Mr. Barrows, but that is true of most men who are appointed commissioners.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPAIRS TO LEGATION PREMISES AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

To enable the ambasador to Turkey to make, under the direction of the Secretary of State, all needed repairs to and improvements in the embassy premises owned by the Government of the United States at Constantinople, Turkey, the sum of $25,111.19 is hereby appropriated, the same being the unexpended balance of the sum of $150,000 appropriated by the diplomatic and consular act approved June 16, 1906, for the purchase of legation premises at Constantinople: Provided, That the total cost shall not exceed the amount herein appropriated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what is the occasion for making the repairs and improvements to the embassy in Constantinople provided for in this item?

Mr. COUSINS. There were eighteen people owning these premises, and whoever was acting for them agreed to put the building in perfect repair and make certain additions that would serve to properly house the officers of the embassy. In order to get title from these people and prevent somebody else from getting the building, we took it without the repairs being made, but after making an agreement that the estimated cost of repairs, $25,111.19, should be deducted from the cost price, the ambassador believing that he could use the balance for repairs. But the Comptroller ruled that he would not and could not allow the amount for repairs and additions without special authorization from Congress. The item herein contained simply reappropriates what we have already appropriated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the explanation of the gentleman, which I suppose is necessarily furnished to him by other officials, is very clear and very plain. But the amount is identical with the exact balance of the appropriation. In other words, the building which we have just purchased under the appropriation, the people interested seeing the money was there within reach of their hand, and the hand only held by the Comptroller, want that Comptroller removed so they can reach it for repairs of the building just purchased. I have no doubt if we go into the business of purchasing embassies we will go into the business of repairing and improving them in order to provide quarters for additional persons not included in the original act.

Mr. COUSINS. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not put the Department in a false position because this estimate was made on what the repairs would cost, and that is the reason the items appear just as enumerated here, and the dollars and cents referred to are the result of estimates that were carefully made to include the repairs.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about that. There was no estimate of these repairs when the original purchase was made.

Mr. COUSINS. I did not say so.

Mr. MANN. To make the gentleman's statement correct, it would be necessary to say that you estimated the amount of repairs before you made the purchase.

Mr. COUSINS. No; they expected to have the repairs made so that they could take it over for $150,000. The estimate had to be made after the property was bargained for.

Mr. MANN. And it happened that the estimate comes to a cent with the fund that is left out of the original appropriation?

Mr. COUSINS. It is just as if the gentleman from Illinois was figuring upon the addition or repairs to his house; it might come out in even dollars and it might not.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Illinois was figuring on an addition and repairs to his house, he probably would ascertain just how much he had and then the estimate would come out according to the fund he had; but that is not the way the ordinary man would figure it.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it would relieve the situation to cut off the 19 cents? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. COUSINS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Was the contract made for the purchase before the appropriation was made?

Mr. COUSINS. No. They had certain negotiations through which they knew what they could get it for.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it a new building?

Mr. COUSINS. No; but I am told by those who have seen it that it is a very desirable building and was a good purchase.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the American agent know that it would require to be repaired after its purchase?

Mr. COUSINS. He intended that the repairs should be included in the purchase price.

Mr. MADDEN. Was the amount of money required for the repairs estimated in the amount required for the appropriation?

Mr. COUSINS. Certainly; that is, estimated by the ambassador and the eighteen coowners, not by the Department of State.

Mr. MADDEN. This estimate for repairs was made before the building was bought?

Mr. COUSINS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. They must have known how much the repairs were going to cost or they would not have included it in the appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL UNION OF AMERICAN REPUBLICS.

International Bureau of American Republics, $54,000: Provided, That any moneys received from the other American Republics for the support of the Bureau, or from the sale of the Bureau publications, from rents, or other sources, shall be paid into the Treasury as a credit, in addition to the appropriation, and may be drawn therefrom upon requisitions of the Secretary of State for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the Bureau: And provided further, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print an edition of the Monthly Bulletin, not to exceed 5,000 copies, for distribution by the Bureau every month during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph; and I make the point of order on the language in lines 18 and 19, "from rents, or other sources," unless the gentleman desires me to reserve it.

Mr. COUSINS. That is in the existing law, and has been for some time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means in the current appropriation.

Mr. COUSINS. It is in the act, the appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. If it is in the act, then the gentleman does not need it here. We have been recently striking out all of these appropriations that pay back money into a fund, so that Congress retains control over the appropriatiohs.

Mr. LANDIS. This does not change existing law.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means does not change current appropriations. It does change existing law.

Mr. LANDIS. This same language has been in this bill for several years.

Mr. MANN. I know it, but it ought not to be in the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What does the point of order cover?

Mr. MANN. The language "from rents or other sources."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This does not prevent the payment of money into the Treasury in making it a permanent appropriation. Why does not the gentleman include the words "shall be paid into the Treasury as a credit, in addition to the appropriation," and so forth? Include the whole clause.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is right about that. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill to explain why this increase of $18,000 was made.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, I spoke about that subject when I explained the bill. It is because that in this family, as you might say, of American republics, through the governing board, which consists of representatives from all of them, it has been recommended that in proportion to the population an increase be made for the machinery and carrying on of this good work. They have agreed to it, and we are the largest brother in that family. It would seem a very doubtful thing not to accede to that recommendation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the gentleman another question, and I am just asking the gentleman for his own opinion. Does he think that this International Bureau of American Republics is going to become a permanent thing?

Mr. COUSINS. We have accepted a gift from Mr. Andrew Carnegie to build a very fine building for it and have appropriated $200,000 ourselves for that purpose, and no doubt it will be permanent, at least so far as we can see now. I will say to the gentleman that it has been one of the best investments we have ever gone into.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I do not know much about what the Bureau has been doing lately. I have been too much occupied for five years in other things. I took quite an interest in it, however, some six years or more ago. It seemed to me that it was doing very little that amounted to anything, publishing a whole lot of stuff for the most part obtainable in Government publications of their respective countries—some consular reports and some quite interesting little monographs about this, that, or the other industrial condition of some other country. Are they doing any better work now?

Mr. COUSINS. I must say that they are. I will say that I started in to examine this matter myself somewhat skeptical, and the more I investigated—the more the committee investigated—the more firmly we became convinced that this is a good investment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it is of the very highest importance and worthy of all encouragement that there should be the very closest sort of relationship and friendliest sort of feeling between the people of the United States and the other countries of the three Americas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman from Mississippi will permit me to interrupt, I will state that I live on the border of Mexico, and they are doing quite a good work there between the United States and Mexico. We get a great deal of valuable information with reference to the products of Mexico and the exchange of products between this country and Mexico.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They were giving that before, but it was all obtainable in the census reports of other countries. I was going to say that the danger of this is that certain people get into it and stay in it and there is circumlocution of office, but if they will do good work, and there is work to be done there, it will more than repay all the expense incurred in the doing of it.

Mr. COUSINS. I will say to the gentleman that I recently went through the establishment and made careful examination, and I wish to say I have seen no livelier exertions or more thorough work being done, apparently, than I witnessed there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I see this section provides for the printing of 5,000 bulletins monthly. What goes with these bulletins?

Mr. COUSINS. Who distributes them?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. COUSINS. They are distributed by the Bureau. They would be distributed on the gentleman's order, for instance, if his constituent asked for them. I myself recently have had many requests for these various bulletins on the different republics, and they have served constituents of mine very satisfactorily.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Were not they originally distributed through the members of the House and Senate?

Mr. COUSINS. They were put to our credit, but they were distributed through the Bureau at the request of gentlemen. For instance, the Bureau would supply a constituent of the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are very interesting documents and we used to get a copy, but I have not heard of or seen one for two or three years.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's secretary is a little negligent, perhaps.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He is a very bright young man, I will say.

Mr. MANN. Maybe he reads them himself.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Maybe he does.

Mr. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that he can have his name placed upon the list and have the bulletins sent regularly by simply furnishing his name to the Director of the Bureau.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you get one?

Mr. LANDIS. I do not get one, but I can get one when I want one.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you get one regularly?

Mr. LANDIS. No; I am not on the list.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why do you not get on the list?

Mr. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that I believe it would be to the advantage of every Member of Congress to have his name placed on that list.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think so, and I had supposed they had quit publishing them. I used to read them every time I got one.

Mr. LANDIS. I do not believe there is any money spent by the Government at this time that is spent more advantageously than the money that is spent in increasing the friendly relations between the United States and Latin America and developing the trade relations between North America and Central America and South America; and I will say that this increase in the appropriation is made because of an agreement which was arrived at by the governing board at a meeting held in Washington about a year ago. This board is composed of the diplomatic representatives of the various republics. The matter was brought to the attention of the Pan-American Congress which was held at Rio Janeiro in 1906, and the scope of the work of this Bureau was enlarged by resolutions which were passed at that conference, and plans were made for additional ramifications of the work. I will say that the present Director, Mr. John Barrett—and I say it without reflecting in any manner upon his predecessors—is, in my opinion, better equipped than anyone ever identified with the Bureau for carrying on the work; and since he took charge of this Bureau in January, 1907, the work has been more than doubled, and unless this appropriation is made they will find themselves absolutely unable to meet the demands made upon them.

Mr. COUSINS. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, I want to add to what was said a moment ago, that when this Bureau was established in 1890 the exports from the United States to Latin America was $72,571,000. In 1907 they amounted to $275,722,000, an increase of 250 per cent.

Mr. MANN. What is the need of a ship subsidy, then? [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit me, I would like to say I am very much in favor of maintaining this Bureau and making it as effective as possible. It has been my theory for years that we ought to have this South and Central American trade, and I am willing to do anything reasonable to get it. I would like to see all the walls of partition broken down that are between us in a commercial way.

Mr. LANDIS. Would the gentleman go so far as to provide mail facilities——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will not vote for a ship subsidy under any circumstances whatever. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LANDIS. Would the gentleman go so far as to provide payment for carrying the United States mails to such an extent as to induce ships to go into that trade?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; but I am in favor of all sorts of arbitration treaties and reciprocity treaties with the States of Central and South America, and if we had acted with any common sense in the last forty years, we would have had the bulk of their trade now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that the ships would come of their own accord if we had the trade, and if we could reduce the tax upon our goods going there and the tax upon their goods coming here, a merchant marine would build itself.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, certainly it would.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that we had all sorts of reciprocity agreements with these Central American States until the Democratic Administration came in, in about 1894, when they repealed the law under which they were founded and abrogated all the treaties. I am glad that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is converted to our idea of it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] a question. Why does not the Republican Senate ratify these reciprocity treaties that John A. Kasson, the agent of President McKinley, negotiated with these South and Central American States and other commercial nations of the world?

Mr. PAYNE. I am not a member of the Senate. I know what would actuate me. They treat us like a jug handle, and we hardly get the handle of the jug.

Mr. ADAIR. I was going to say in connection with what has been said on the subject of bulletins that I never had to be placed on that list, and I have not been a Member of this House very long. But my term had scarcely begun until I began receiving these bulletins, and I have received them practically ever since my term of office began. I never asked to be placed on the list.

Mr. LANDIS. You are talking about the consular reports?

Mr. ADAIR. Yes, sir.

Mr. LANDIS. This is an entirely different publication.

Mr. ADAIR. What publication is it that the gentleman has reference to?

Mr. LANDIS. This is a monthly bulletin issued by the International Bureau of American Republics. What the gentleman refers to are the consular reports.

Mr. MANN. Printed in English and Spanish.

Mr. ADAIR. I have received those regularly..

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there is a point of order pending here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. Does the gentleman from Mississippi reserve the point of order?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, being satisfied with the explanation made, I will withdraw the point of order, but I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] wishes to renew it.

Mr. MANN. I wish to renew the point of order on what I first made it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state what his point of order is.

Mr. MANN. Lines 18 and 19, the words "from rents or other sources."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What does that cut out?

Mr. MANN. The whole paragraph is a legislative paragraph, as far as that is concerned, and the reason for my point of order is this, that it provides that the money that comes in in this way shall be paid out again without being reappropriated. Now, I do not make that as to the money that comes in from the sale of publications. I think that the money that comes in to the Government in any way under ordinary circumstances ought to be paid into the Treasury of the United States and paid out again by appropriation.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to suggest to the gentleman that this is really paid to the United States itself for specific purposes in carrying out the objects of this Bureau.

Mr. MANN. I do not make the point of order on the point that the money that is paid in by the Bureau, by the various American republics, or the money that is paid in from the sale of publications; but I am not willing, as far as I am concerned, if I can help it, to have money coming into the Government Treasury in ordinary ways being paid out without appropriation. It says "from rents or other sources." I do not know what the other sources may be, but they do not include the money that is contributed by the other countries.

Mr. PAYNE. Have they the rents of that part of this office building that is rented here by these Republics?

Mr. PERKINS. It belongs to the Bureau.

Mr. PAYNE. That is just as much in trust as the other.

Mr. MANN. If we have built a building here to rent, that is something we did not know.

Mr. PAYNE. If the American Republics have built a building larger than they can use, and it is their building, and the rents come in, it is just as much a part of this trust on the part of the United States to execute as it is from the money coming to——

Mr. MANN. If this Bureau has built a building here to rent, and nearly all of the money has come out of the Treasury of the United States and not from any other country, it is time we ascertained it.

Mr. PAYNE. All have contributed.

Mr. MANN. We contribute three-fourths or two-thirds?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know the proportion, but our proportion ought to be a good deal larger than the small republics down there.

Mr. MANN. Can any gentleman here tell us how large a proportion the United States has contributed?

Mr. LANDIS. It is about one-half.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman make that as an authoritative statement?

Mr. LANDIS. I make that statement upon information that has come to the committee.

Mr. PERKINS. We pay a little more than half.

Mr. MANN. I take the gentleman's statement; but my impression, from the information I have received, is that we pay about two-thirds.

Mr. LANDIS. It is a trifle more than a half. Now, speaking about the point of order, I do not think it matters whether the words "from rents and other sources" do go out of this bill. The bill has carried these words for years. These words were put in by reason of the fact that the Bureau, originally, when it rented a building, took a building larger than it needed and sublet some of the rooms, and the money thus paid in they desired authority to use and apply on their own rent.

Mr. MANN. Which is proper enough. But I do not understand that applies now.

Mr. LANDIS. That does not apply now. The gentleman does not make the point of order against the Bureau having the use of the money paid for the sale of the publications?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; I can see reasons for that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman if the ground of the point of order is that it is new legislation——

Mr. MANN. It is legislation, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to find out what was eliminated.

Mr. MANN. Just "from rents and other sources."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 18, after "publications," strike out the words "from rent and other sources."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask somebody how much revenue this amendment cuts off?

Mr. MANN. It does not cut off any.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I myself personally well know Mr. Barrett. I have known him for a long time, and I want to say that he is a proper man for the place. He has proved that.

Mr. LANDIS. The information that we have is that this will not cut off a cent from the Bureau.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We have not paid enough attention to our trade down there in South America for a great many years. One of the greatest Republicans, Mr. Blaine, tried to teach his party for years that we ought to extend our trade there instead of going over across the Atlantic, where we have so much competition in all we have to sell. Mr. Barrett has been all over South America. He went down there as an officer of the American Government.

I think he was appointed by President Roosevelt. He went to the northern part of South America. He also went down to South America with Secretary Root. I have had long talks with him about his trips and this subject. He went all across the Andes Mountains, riding a donkey and walking some, possibly having to fly at times to get along, but he always got there and reported. He went all over these countries down there and investigated the possibility of opening up trade with those countries. Now, he has come back here. He is well informed as to the business wants and the condition of those people. I was delighted to hear the gentleman from Iowa say that our trade under John Barrett's administration down there had increased about 255 per cent.

Mr. COUSINS. Since 1890.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was glad to learn that, and I venture to say a large part of this increase has been under Mr. Barrett's administration. He is a man that is very fully equipped for his duties; he is a man of brains and talks several languages—about as many as the human tongue can manage; he is a good fellow, and, as proof of the fact, he was educated in the city of Nashville, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. I am somewhat surprised that so good a lobbyist as Mr. Barrett, with such an able friend as the gentleman from Tennessee, has not been so good as to send a single copy of the bulletin to the gentleman from Tennessee which he sent to other Members of Congress.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I talked with Barrett.

Mr. MANN. It must be a compliment to me that he should send me a copy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I see Mr. Barrett and talk with him every week, and talk with him about his public business.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL BUREAU OF THE PERMANENT COURT OF ARBITRATION.

To meet the share of the United States in the expenses for the year 1907 of the International Bureau of the Permanent Court of Arbitration, created under article 22 of the convention concluded at The Hague July 29, 1899, for the pacific settlement of international disputes, $1,250.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

There are some expenditures made by a government that are investments returning interest many fold. What little money we have spent for this purpose can be ranked in that class. I want, however, to say that it seems to me that we ought to go further. To appropriate $1,250 for the sole purpose for which this appropriation is made is sufficient, but we ought to take in some other purposes. I do not believe that the court at The Hague is ever going to amount to anything until it is made really permanent and really stable and given by that international prestige. I do not believe it is ever going to do any real good until men are appointed as members of it for long terms at any rate, and are men who are international lawyers, of international reputation—until they are paid salaries sufficient to enable them to devote their entire energies to the purposes contemplated by the organization of The Hague court, to wit, to act as arbitrators when selected as arbitrators, but especially, and above all things, by employing themselves, together with the other members of The Hague court, in codifying existing customs and laws constituting what is called "international law," and in suggesting amendments to existing recognized international law, with a view to more certainly preserving the peace and more certainly preventing war, and more certainly alleviating the miseries of war when war, in spite of all of it, shall come.

When a member of the Interparliamentary Peace Congress at London, sent there as one of the delegates from the American group, I made two suggestions to the American group which were adopted by them, one of which was adopted by the council, subsequently by the congress, and afterwards became a part of the model arbitration treaty. That one was to include amongst the matters submitted to arbitration "all questions concerning debt." My second proposition—which was adopted by the American group and reported by them to the council, but concerning which the council said it thought it would be better to postpone its consideration to another congress, in order to give time for its mature consideration because of the vital importance of it and the novelty of it—was this: That each nation subscribing to the treaty establishing The Hague court should be permitted to appoint, as at present, as permanent members of The Hague court not more than four members—to appoint four or three or two or one, just as the particular nation saw fit; but to fix by law, first each nation for itself and subsequently by international treaty, a fixed and uniform and agreed salary to be received by the members of that court and paid by each nation to its own representatives—I should say certainly not less than $15,000 a year—so as to employ men who could devote their lives to that study and that purpose, and so as to employ men who could afford not to take in other law cases involving any question of international law.

The world was somewhat shocked, or at least I was, to learn that some members of The Hague court were attorneys for some of the nations having questions to settle before The Hague court. Of course they were not sitting in the particular case as selected arbitrators, but, being thrown with the others all the time, it seemed to me a mixing up of functions that was not advisable.

Now, one of the things to recommend my plan is this: At the present time each nation has an equal vote in The Hague court. If you left each to appoint not more than four members, but each nation to pay the salaries of its own members, then the large, populous, and rich nations would appoint the full quota to which they are entitled—four—and some of the other countries, like Costa Rica, let us say, small countries, would not want to pay that much, and would appoint one member each, or two or three, so that there would come about somewhat of an approximation to representation in proportion to population.

But leaving all that out, it seems to me that it is about time for the United States Government to set the pace and to invite others to follow it, to make of The Hague court a permanent body. I would not care if the members of it were appointed for life, but they certainly ought to be appointed for not less than, say, ten years, and to receive a salary sufficient to get the very best international genius of the world, not only most competent in knowledge of international law and the customs of nations but of international reputation and prestige, inviting the confidence of all the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move as an amendment to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman can not first make a motion to strike out the last word, and then, his time under that motion being exhausted, follow it up with a motion to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi ask unanimous consent to extend his time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, to relieve the painful situation, I will ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman from Illinois wants to make the point of order I will stop now, unless the Chair overrules the point of order. I do not see why a motion to strike out the last two words is not as good as an amendment to the motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I am willing to ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi shall be extended five minutes, or let the gentleman from Alabama ask it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already put the question. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How did the Chair rule on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That a motion to strike out the last two words is not good as an amendment to a motion to strike out the last word?

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Mississippi has already occupied five minutes on a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Illinois made the point of order because the gentleman from Mississippi a while ago insisted on the parliamentary practice being followed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The "gentleman from Mississippi" will be a little more insistent in a few minutes. The "gentleman from Mississippi" has not been insistent, but has permitted by unanimous consent a motion to strike out the last word to be withdrawn without forcing you to a vote on the motion, and it could not have been withdrawn without unanimous consent. If the "gentleman from Mississippi" had been "filibustering," as your side charges, he would have been pursuing a totally different course. But, on the contrary, the "gentleman from Mississippi" has been pursuing a certain course of calling for the yeas and nays, so that at each call there would go upon the wings of that call notice to the people that the majority of the Republican party has not thus far legislated upon the matters which the Democracy and your President agree ought to be enacted into law—a totally different thing this focusing of attention on failure to legislate from mere filibustering. I could hold one of these appropriation bills in committee two weeks by real filibustering if I desired to do so.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not feel impatient because the point of order is made under the circumstances, when he recalls that this forenoon he made the point of order himself about withdrawing the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And at once gave unanimous consent that it should be withdrawn, but I did protest, and shall again, if needful, against the chairman going over the bill without disposing of the amendment, either by its being voted upon by the House or being withdrawn. I shall do it in the future to conserve undestroyed one of the few barriers that the minority has left between it and the Committee on Rules.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been taken off the subject-matter, and I will try and get back to where I was. The gentleman from Illinois is mistaken if he thinks I am impatient. I am merely undertaking to reply out of order to an argument made out of order.

Now, I say that one of the chief good things about the court of arbitration is that it shall possess the confidence of the civilized world, and that it shall be a permanent court constituted in such a manner that all the nations of the world shall know beforehand of its stability, prestige, and dignity. In order to give it prestige and dignity and stability and reputation it ought to be composed of international lawyers, as I said a moment ago, of international reputation and of men of high character for integrity.

The other provision concerning The Hague court, the manner of selecting the arbiters from the membership of The Hague court, is good enough. Mr. Chairman, it ought to be made a part of the duty of the members of The Hague court to codify, publish, systemize, and suggest to the nations, for their approval, improvements in the international law of the world. We speak of the science of international law as if there was a code of law known as "international law." There is not. It is a mere set of customs and proceedings among nations, a set of precedents following other precedents, but the so-called "international law" is uniformly binding nowhere. What is published as international law in America, gathered from precedents by Wharton and Moore, outlining what has been done by us in our connection with foreign powers, is not altogether the international law that would be recognized in Prussia gathered from the same source, their historic precedents and experiences. The international law laid down by Vattel, what you might call the common law of international law, is a mere text-book statement of international ethics, where it is taken for granted that nations will be guided by ethical principles, like individuals, and will be guided by such principles as are by him laid down.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman allow an interruption? I am in sympathy with the gentleman's position about arbitration, but I would like to know, if he has the information, how the decrees of the permanent court at The Hague would be enforced?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas has asked a pertinent question. Of course, the decrees of the permanent arbitration court at The Hague would be merely persuasive, and could not be enforced any more than any other international arbitration decision could be enforced. Whenever two nations agree to submit a matter to arbitration, the one against whom the arbiters decide may yet go to war if it chooses not to observe good faith, but the decrees of The Hague court would be of more force than the decrees of ordinary arbiters.

What I would like to make out of The Hague court is to make an amphictyonic council of the civilized world.

Mr. BURLESON. Public opinion would aid in enforcing the decrees.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is seldom ever that a civilized nation submits a matter to arbitration and refuses to abide by the decision of the arbitrators.

And they would be the less apt to refuse to abide by a decision of a great and permanent court of international dignity like this proposed by me, the members of each board of arbitration selected out of its membership to act as arbiters, than they would be in cases where, as is now generally the case, one nation selects one and another another and each goes there to represent not justice, but his own country, and the two selecting, in case of difference, a third. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the payment of the quota of the United States for the support of the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, Italy, for the fiscal year 1907, $4,800.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph just read. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what is intended to be accomplished by this appropriation?

Mr. MANN. It is intended to support that man down in Italy.

Mr. COUSINS. This is the amount agreed to as our quota, no part of which goes to any commissioner. That part will be performed probably by our representative at Rome.

Mr. MADDEN. How long has this method of engaging in the work of agriculture at Rome been in existence?

Mr. COUSINS. About two years. It was created by the gentleman's Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MADDEN. When was it created, and by what authority, and by what law?

Mr. COUSINS. About two years ago, by the Committee on Appropriations, of which the gentleman is a member.

Mr. MADDEN. This is the first time it has appeared in this bill?

Mr. COUSINS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of order against this, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that this is legislation?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of quarters for the student interpreters attached to the embassy at Tokyo, Japan, $600, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order for the purpose of getting an explanation, at least. I wish the gentleman would explain to the House these student-interpreters' business and why it becomes necessary for the first time to rent quarters for them.

Mr. COUSINS. Our student interpreters in China are housed in our legation buildings. The student interpreters to Japan have no building.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How long have we had these student interpreters in Japan?

Mr. COUSINS. Two years in Japan, and in China about six. These student interpreters in Japan are now obliged to live out among the missionaries or wherever they can find a place to live, and in order to give them the instructions it is necessary, or desirable at least, that they should be together in some place, so that the instructor can meet them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is this? It has come upon this bill since I was a member of the committee. It is rather new to me and I have never had it explained. Are these Americans who are there studying Japanese for the purpose of providing our embassies and consulates with their own interpreters?

Mr. COUSINS. Precisely; and for any other necessities that may arise. There are one or two of them now serving as deputy consuls, and they are really the most efficient class of clerical assistants that we have.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How are they appointed?

Mr. COUSINS. By the President, through this board of examination. They have to pass a rather rigid examination.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that an examining board in the State Department?

Mr. COUSINS. Yes; one of whom is a member of the Civil Service Commission, and others are chosen by the Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is a sort of school, then, through which these young fellows are put, in order to fit them for the work around legations and consulates.

Mr. COUSINS. Precisely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The judge of the said court and the district attorney shall, when the sessions of the court are held at other cities than Shanghai, receive in addition to their salaries their actual expenses during such sessions, not to exceed $10 per day for the judge and $5 per day for the district attorney, and so much as may be necessary during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the gentleman's attention to this language:

The judge of said court * * * shall receive not to exceed $10 per day for the judge and $5 per day for the district attorney, and so much as may be necessary, etc.

The gentleman will notice that that is not "or so much as may be necessary," nor "or so much thereof as may be necessary in order," nor "and so much as may be necessary for this purpose," but it is, "and so much as may be necessary during the fiscal year," and so forth. It seems to me that leaves an absolutely unlimited appropriation, not circumscribed at all.

Mr. COUSINS. It was not so intended. That is the language of the law the Appropriation Committee has provided for this.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems to me that ought to read, "or so much as may be necessary for said purposes," so as to limit it.

Mr. PERKINS. I think the gentleman is wrong in his reading. The provision provides, first, that the judge is to be allowed $10 a day for his expenses.

Mr. COUSINS. I think the gentleman from Michigan will be able to explain——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from New York is about to do so.

Mr. PERKINS. The district attorney gets $5 a day for his expenses, and that means of course so much money is appropriated as is necessary to pay the expenses of these two officials while on duty——

Mr. WILLIAMS. For this purpose?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then that ought to be in there. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, to insert on page 17, line 15, after the word "necessary," the words "for said purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 15, after the word "necessary," insert the words "for said purposes."

Mr. McCALL. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this allowance for expenses is under some statute?

Mr. COUSINS. It is under the law. It is the very law which was passed by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. McCALL. Does the statute provide compensation for the district attorney by the day?

Mr. DENBY. This is existing law, I will state to the gentleman, but——

Mr. McCALL. I was simply wondering why the judge's expenses should be twice as great as those of the district attorney. I could see no reason for the discrimination in the law.

Mr. DENBY. It has existed since the foundation of the court.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of premises for the use of the United States court for China at Shanghai, $2,400.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph that it changes existing law. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee how it happens that those words become for the first time necessary. How has the court been housed up to this time?

Mr. COUSINS. They were housed in a consulate building there where they were all thrown together in a very promiscuous way, and it has been very difficult for the court to continue its business, and they want to get out of that building and be separate by themselves——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And get a building exclusively for court purposes?

Mr. COUSINS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOUNDARY LINE, UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

For the more effective demarcation and mapping of the boundary line between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, as established under existing treaties, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, including employment at the seat of government of such surveyors, computers, and draftsmen as are necessary to reduce field notes, and to be immediately available and continue available until expended, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the words in lines 16 and 17, "and to be immediately available and continue available until expended."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COUSINS. One moment. I wish the gentleman to reserve his point for a moment. Unless this is made immediately available, these parties can not proceed on their work. It would simply stop the work unless it was made immediately available, because there are no funds whatever.

Mr. MANN. Why did not they send in a deficiency estimate before the Appropriations Committee? Why does not the Department follow the law?

Mr. COUSINS. These parties have to be made up before the 1st of June, and it will simply delay the work another year unless this money is immediately available. They can not equip themselves. Now the Canadian commissioners are provided for.

Mr. MANN. They can make up their party; they can make a contract before the 1st of July.

Mr. COUSINS. But they have no money.

Mr. MANN. They can still go before the Appropriations Committee, which still have to make up the deficiency appropriation bill. I think this Department of the Government ought to follow the law covering these things.

Mr. COUSINS. Well, this properly belongs to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. MANN. Not as a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. PAYNE. Is this a new appropriation?

Mr. COUSINS. No; it is in accordance with the treaties providing for this boundary.

Mr. MANN. I did not make the point where it was in Alaska because I could see there it might be necessary to reappropriate the balance of this year's appropriation and make the new appropriation instantly available. There is some reason for that, because the working season in Alaska is very short, but there is no reason for it here; the working season is not short. If the Department fails to do its duty and follow the law, I do not know——

Mr. COUSINS. They have been doing their duty and following the law, but they need this money to do the work.

Mr. MANN. Why did they need to make this to continue available until expended?

Mr. COUSINS. The same language was used last year.

Mr. MANN. What is the good of it? What is the object of sticking into these bills provisions contrary to the usual rules upon appropriation bills, when there is no necessity for it?

Mr. COUSINS. It happens that there is necessity for it, as I have stated, in order to make up these parties, and proceed with the work, which must be proceeded with by the 1st of June; it was necessary to have the money.

Mr. MANN. How much was appropriated for this year?

Mr. COUSINS. The same amount.

Mr. MANN. Well, if that runs through the fiscal year, why do you need to make this available? If that does not run through the fiscal year, why have not you increased this?

Mr. COUSINS. We have not increased it, because it is not made certain we need an increase.

Mr. MANN. I should say it was made certain you needed an increase if you need this money available now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The work may be finished.

Mr. MANN. Finished? It will not be finished until you and I are in the ground many years.

Mr. COUSINS. Oh, yes; I will say to the gentleman we have required every session the Commissioner to appear before us, and he has estimated how long it will take, and even has gone so far as to estimate the probable cost. This is one of the most important works that is now being done.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman tell us where they are now working?

Mr. COUSINS. Yes. They are beginning at the peaks of the Rocky Mountains and are approaching the New England coast and the Great Lakes.

Mr. MANN. Where are they now working?

Mr. COUSINS. Just now they are working nowhere.

Mr. LANDIS. They are working on their computations now in Washington.

Mr. MANN. Last year where were they working?

Mr. COUSINS. They completed from the summit of the Rocky Mountains westward.

Mr. MANN. It has been completed from the summit of the Rocky Mountains westward?

Mr. COUSINS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That has taken something over one hundred and twenty-five years?

Mr. COUSINS. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Now, you propose to finish in a few days or a few years from the Rocky Mountains eastward. I think the statement I made, that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and myself will be under the ground many years before this is completed, is correct. We have an International Boundaries Commission, for which we make appropriations, and we have this Boundary Line Commission, for which we make appropriations.

Mr. McCALL. I would like to ask——

Mr. COUSINS. I can tell you exactly how many miles remains to be done. One thousand two hundred and twenty miles remains to be done, exactly, as I stated, from the summit of the Rocky Mountains to Lake Superior.

Mr. MANN. That is exactly what I stated. Most of it remains to be done.

Mr. McCALL. Can this work be done in the winter time?

Mr. COUSINS. No; it can not be done in the winter time.

Mr. MANN. This Commission has never marked a boundary line from Lake Superior east. We have got an International Boundary Commission to mark that. All this Commission has done is on the west of Lake Superior.

Mr. COUSINS. This is an International Boundary Commission.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman a question if nobody else is talking.

Mr. McCALL. I would like to ask a question or make the suggestion that as the time in which this appropriation can be practically used is from the 1st of June until winter, practically this is an appropriation for the coming year, beginning at June and ending next winter, and that it would be a mere technicality to throw out the work so necessary as the marking of a boundary line between this country and Canada simply because the work could not be delayed until the 1st of July.

Mr. MANN. We have got an appropriation of $20,000 for the fiscal year, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL].

Mr. McCALL. I understood that appropriation was expended before last winter began. This is work that can not be carried on in the winter.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman had a misunderstanding. That appropriation is not so expended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given five minutes, so that I can ask him a few questions. How long is it contemplated it is going to take to establish this boundary line?

Mr. COUSINS. The nearest estimate we can get is from six to seven years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, it was established in 1847, was it not?

Mr. COUSINS. I am sure I do not remember.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is precisely when it was.

Mr. COUSINS. But it is estimated that in not more than eight years they will complete this work.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is it they are doing?

Mr. COUSINS. They are marking the boundary with monuments as nearly imperishable as possible, and it is to save controversies that may arise in the future. It has been said that if we had had marked the boundary lines of Venezuela that would have saved several millions of dollars that were expended because of the controversy that arose there. The gentleman knows that good fences make good neighbors.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Were not brass monuments put on this line years ago—this very identical line between the United States and Great Britain's possessions?

Mr. COUSINS. So far as they have gone recently they have put up aluminum monuments.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How long has this boundary commission been on the work?

Mr. COUSINS. I really do not know.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The line from the Lakes east was agreed on in 1843 and the line west was agreed on in 1847. It has taken a long time to fix the monuments.

Mr. COUSINS. Very little was ever done until the Venezuela trouble arose, and then they went to work with a full realization of the importance of defined boundaries.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS ON TUBERCULOSIS.

To enable the Government of the United States suitably to participate in the International Congress on Tuberculosis, which will convene at Washington, September 21 to October 12, 1908, $25,000.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order on that paragraph, not for the purpose of speaking to the paragraph, but on another matter.

This morning the subcommittee on the distribution of rooms had a meeting, where gentlemen who are the active managers of this proposed tuberculosis congress were heard. They made an argument before us in favor of the tuberculosis congress, using the House Office Building, and also in favor of a concurrent resolution, which I introduced recently, permitting them to use this Chamber and the Senate Chamber and the adjoining corridors and lobbies.

In the course of the next few days I would like to have, and I know the other members of our committee would like to have some expression of opinion from Members of the House as to whether we desire to create the precedent of giving up the House Office Building to outside congresses or for other purposes; and whether, if we do not do that, we desire to make an exception of the Capitol Building. The original circular letter which was sent out by Doctor Fulton and Doctor Buyer proposed to make use of the individual office rooms and committee rooms over in the building.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any precedent for the use of this room or the Senate Chamber for such outside purposes?

Mr. MANN. When I proposed to introduce this resolution the other day, I spoke to the gentleman who furnishes so much parliamentary information to various Speakers and chairmen—and, by the way, he is the greatest parlimentarian in the world, and as he can not hear me I say that. He said to me that there had been many precedents for it, and it had been very difficult to break away from them, and that if it was established again it would make it still more difficult.

Mr. PAYNE. It has been a good thing to break away from them.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PAYNE. And the sooner we break away from them the better. I would like to see it made so that they will not get back to them again.

Mr. MANN. The room over there is not satisfactory. They will have, they state, as high as seven or thirteen sections. I may have got the numbers confused.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Have we got that many vacant rooms?

Mr. MANN. We have no vacant rooms there at all that are finished. The principal conference and general committee room and other accommodation of that sort are not finished. The Superintendent of the Capitol is not willing to go on with the work until Congress adjourns, and he will not be able to finish these large rooms in time for the meeting of this tuberculosis congress in September.

But what they first asked for in sending out the letters about which I suppose some Members have received correspondence already was the use of the individual office rooms. What they say now is that they do not desire that, but they would desire to use the corridors over there and some of the larger rooms where they can house their exhibits. They propose to have exhibits, some of the exhibits upon tables, models, and various things, and then a large number of hangings, maps, for exhibits of various sorts. Of course they would not contemplate the use of the exhibits by hanging them on the walls of the corridor, because that would damage the walls, but to put up some kind of framework to which the exhibits could be hung.

They say that they have already received acceptations from a large number of foreign countries, and I think they state from twenty-six States, all of which wish to make large exhibits.

If our information and our impressions are correct, it will take a very large portion of the space in the corridors over there. I told them that as far as I was concerned, and some of the other members of the committee said the same thing, that we never would be willing to turn over the individual office rooms for the use of anybody outside, because if we authorized our own constituents to ask us for the use of our individual office rooms over there and created that precedent, every congress that met in Washington would have their Members doing the same thing, and no Member with authority to turn over his room to his constituents was in a position well to refuse it.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman has very nearly answered a question that I was going to ask him, and that is whether Members of the House have a right to assign or transfer or sublease their office rooms to this meeting or "congress," as I believe it is called, or to anybody.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman desires me to give my opinion about that plainly, I should say that no Member has that right without the authority of the House or Congress.

Mr. KEIFER. That is the point I want to get at. I understand that a number of Members that have been written to, as I have been written to, with a request that we agree that the rooms shall be used, have answered and said that the rooms could be used; and I think the congress that is seeking to meet here this coming summer expects now to use a number of rooms with the assent of the Members to whom the rooms have been assigned. I wish it to be understood that I am willing to let my room be used in that way if I have the authority of the House.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. I wish to say to the gentleman that in all probability these letters have been written by people who did not understand what the congress really needed. They would not or could not have any use for the private rooms which have been referred to. They simply wanted the use of the corridors for the exhibits, and the use of some of the large committee rooms for the sections, to which I do not say that there can be any reasonable objection.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says there would be no objection. Does the gentleman think it would be desirable to let somebody else go into the committee rooms over there, where the committee's files are and everything of that sort, and throw them open in the summer time and have them public?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. As I understand, the large rooms where they have hearings have no files in them. It is only the private rooms.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about that. The largest room over there that is a committee room is the Ways and Means Committee room. I do not think it would be practicable to let them use the Ways and Means Committee room, because it is essential that there be some work done in that committee room. As to the other large rooms that are not finished, they are not available for public hall purposes without furniture or hangings in them.

Mr. PAYNE. There are some enthusiastic gentlemen who say they can convert that large room that was assigned to the Ways and Means Committee into a room where the members can hear each other from opposite sides of the table. If they can have a couple of months at it during the summer time, and if that desirable object can be attained, of course it ought to be done.

Mr. MANN. That will be very easy to be done and must be done, and we could not consent to give them the room for the purpose which has been proposed here.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. The assembling of doctors there might improve the health of that room.

Mr. MANN. There is no trouble with the health.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. Is there not necessity over there for improvement in the acoustic properties of those large rooms, and might there not therefore be some use for the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics to get their fine work in over there? As chairman of that important committee I did not know but what there might be room for the committee to have some hearings and have some printing done.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman desires an answer to the question, I would suggest that he is occupying, as chairman of that distinguished and important committee, one of the rooms over there, while I have not had the good fortune to move over, although I hope to soon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask the gentleman if it would not be possible for them to use the unfinished room by putting chairs and a temporary platform in it?

Mr. MANN. I do not think so. About the last thing that is finished is the floor, and it is not possible to use a room very well until you have a floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is there no floor down at all?

Mr. MANN. No floor in these rooms. The rooms are not suitable for a public meeting on account of the echo in all the rooms until they have furniture and hangings. I would like to have the sentiment of Members of the House on this question for the next few days. Personally I am inclined to think that owing to the importance of the Congress and the fact that they expect to have here 3,000 or 4,000 delegates, that it will be probably not only the largest medical convention, but the largest convention of an international sort that has ever been held in this country, and I have been inclined on account of the importance of it to let them use this room and the Senate Chamber and put their exhibits in the lobbies and the corridors.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When would they hold their meetings, in the nighttime or in the daytime when we might want to use it?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the convention is to be for three weeks, in September or October; not when Congress is in session at all. There will be two meetings, as they explained to me, where they may all gather together, and where they would hold those I do not know. Then they divide it into sections, and they would perhaps place a section in this room, a section in the lobby, a section in the Senate Chamber, and a section in the marble room, and then they would have to find other places for other sections.

Mr. PERKINS. But does not the gentleman know that a permission so granted by this Congress would have to be granted for every important meeting hereafter?

Mr. MANN. Of course it is much easier to refuse future congresses the use of the Capitol than it would be to refuse them the use of the House Office Building, if you create a precedent.

Mr. PERKINS. If you create a precedent, how could you refuse anyone?

Mr. PAYNE. I should be reluctant to vote to establish a precedent allowing any outside body to occupy the House and the Capitol; I do not care who they are. It is difficult to distinguish between bodies of citizens who might for benevolent or beneficent purposes ask for the use of the Capitol. If you once begin, I do not know where the end would be. I would much rather vote for an appropriation to hire a building in the city and rent it for three weeks than to vote for the devotion of the Capitol to this purpose, and in the end I am not sure but that it would be much cheaper than to utilize the Capitol.

Mr. MANN. I feel exactly as does the gentleman from New York, and I would much rather vote for an appropriation to hire a building, if there were any in Washington. There are no suitable buildings in Washington.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It will be in the summer time and they could hire a theater.

Mr. MANN. That is a mere bagatelle to the space they want.

Mr. PAYNE. The old Convention Hall has more space than the Capitol.

Mr. MANN. I do not undertake to say myself, but they have been to Convention Hall and they say that the space there is wholly inadequate.

Mr. PERKINS. There is more space there than there is here.

Mr. MANN. Not more space there if you take into consideration the rooms, the lobbies, and these corridors.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question to see if the matter can not be clarified. Is it not a fact that this international congress has been recognized by other countries and that their meetings have been held in public buildings in other lands?

Mr. MANN. It is so stated.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman know whether the English Government has ever allowed any meeting of this kind in the Parliament buildings?

Mr. MANN. My understanding is not. My understanding is that the last meeting was held in the Reichstag.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Imperial Government at Berlin recognized this international congress. From the very nature of the case this is investigation and legislation that no single country can undertake. It is an investigation of an international subject, and it ought to have the support of every legislative body in all civilized countries It is a little like the International Postal Congress, which is held in various countries at different times, and has the official recognition and support of the various governments. It seems to me we would be setting no precedent which would rise to plague us if we allowed the International Congress on Tuberculosis to meet in the Capitol building at Washington, and use the halls of the Senate and the House of Representatives just as we would permit any postal congress to meet in a public building in this city.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or any other international convention.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Or any other international convention of public moment and having an official recognition of the Government. It seems to me that no dangerous precedent would be set, and I, for one, would like to see the Capitol building turned over to the use of this international congress, so far as possible, without interfering with any public matters. I think, as far as the Office Building is concerned, that might be subject to objection, but certainly there can be no objection to allowing the use of this Chamber, which will then be idle; the Senate Chamber, which will then be idle, and the corridors of the Capitol, which will then be unoccupied.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the last point the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] made is one that argues very strongly in favor of turning over the Chambers of the Capitol building to this International Congress. As he said and well said, Congress can not and will not then be in session. The corridors will be empty and the Chambers will be empty and the galleries will be empty and possibly a great many of the offices in the Capitol will be absolutely empty. And, inasmuch as the civilized nations of the world are trying to unite to study and exterminate this terrible disease, tuberculosis, we certainly should approach the subject, not as a matter of national importance only, but as a matter of international importance. The United States, in other words, is the host of this affair, and we are directly interested in the subject.

I have no doubt that many of the gentlemen present have read of the great number of people who die yearly from tuberculosis. Why, I know now of an individual who weighed over 200 pounds when stricken with this disease, and the physicians can not account for it. The fair patient is fading away, though tenderly attended with all that love and money can bestow.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I would say for the information of the committee that, with many unfinished rooms in the Office Building, if they would simply put chairs in there it would serve any purpose that might be necessary. It is not necessary for them to go into the rooms where files may be disturbed, but in any event they are not a class of people that would disturb anything.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They are people of the very highest order, of course.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. I think they ought to be given the best accommodation the Congress can afford.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why, these people come representing foreign countries and not as individuals. They are here representing foreign nations from all over the world who are trying to eliminate this scourge of the human family. It does seem to me that the American Congress should bestir itself at once, and, if necessary, let a special committee be appointed to tend to the matter. Let the people of these foreign countries who are trying to overcome this terrible disease be received with dignity and consideration which so distinguished a body and the subject merit. Let us from our own standpoint as American people, afflicted as we know we are with this disease, treat the matter not from a local or selfish standpoint, but rise above that, and become international in treating the whole matter. I want to help the victims now and those to come and these visitors who are to investigate the subject. I have received a number of letters which were quite unnecessary, for I realized the importance of the matter. I do not see any reason why we should not take a great pleasure in taking up the matter and agreeing to turn over these empty halls in the Capitol to these international representatives and bid them Godspeed in their great undertaking.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. BURTON] spoke of utilizing the present unfinished rooms in the House Office Building. To my mind that is wholly impracticable. The rooms that are unfinished in the House Office Building will be needed, when finished, for the use of the House. There is a general committee room. There is a conference room. Now, either we would have to leave those rooms as they now are until next winter, when we can not finish them and will not have the use of them next winter at all, or else we will have to finish them during the summer, and if we attempt to finish them during the summer they will be just in that condition where they can not be used next September and October. So far as I am concerned, I am quite unwilling to say that we will hold those rooms in their present condition for a year and a half simply that the tuberculosis congress may use them during the space of three weeks.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is not plenty of time between now and October to finish these rooms?

Mr. MANN. Well, the tuberculosis congress will commence in September, permit me to say to the gentleman, and the Superintendent of the Capitol tells me that he will not undertake to finish those rooms between now and the time of the meeting of the tuberculosis congress—that is, that he does not think it possible to do it.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me the international gathering of physicians and scientists to be held in the city of Washington next September is of such great importance to the people that we can well afford to encourage it in every way that it is possible for us to do. Now, if there was another hall in the city of Washington that would accommodate this gathering I would believe that it would be right to make an appropriation to take care of this meeting, but the evidence shows that there is not such a hall or any such halls in Washington that are able to accommodate this great crowd that will be here at that time. I am not in favor of giving up the National House to every meeting that may come to Washington, but when we think of the great importance that is attached to such a gathering as will be held here in September, I believe that we can well forego any feeling that we have in this matter and allow the use of this Hall at that time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will allow me, it being international, it will be a long time before they come back here.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. It is hardly possible that they will be back here for several years to come. Now, it is a fact, Mr. Chairman, when we think of the investigations that have taken place in the last few years in regard to yellow fever, when we have seen what has been done, and I dare say that if it had not been for the investigations in yellow fever and in malarial fever and the way to prevent these diseases, it would have been almost an impossibility to have dug the Panama Canal. [Applause.]

The physicians who went to Cuba and investigated those diseases demonstrated to the world what it meant to find out the cause and manner of transmission of those diseases, and it has been of inestimable value in the saving of suffering and human lives, and I say to you to-day that tuberculosis is as important or possibly more important than that of yellow fever or malaria. More lives are lost on account of it. So with this feeling that I have and what little I know of medicine, I feel possibly more importance attaches to it than you do, but I believe we can afford to encourage and do all that is in our power to bring about a successful meeting here in Washington City that may in the end result in finding out a way to prevent and cure this dreadful disease that afflicts the human race and results in such great mortality. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES, CONSULAR SERVICE.

For salaries of consuls-general, consuls, and consular inspectors, as provided for in the act approved April 5, 1906, entitled "An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States," $1,061,000.

Mr. DENBY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That deputy consuls-general at Shanghai are hereby invested with authority to exercise, and shall exercise, without compensation, and upon the written direction of the consul-general at Shanghai, the same judicial powers that are possessed by the consul-general.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. DENBY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to relieve the consul-general at Shanghai from certain justice-court jurisdiction which he exercises to-day in the trial of cases which were left to him by the Shanghai court act of two years ago. The American consul-general at Shanghai is the highest paid and most important consular officer in Asia. His duties are very numerous and exceedingly engrossing, and to compel him to take two or three days per week or more to try cases involving amounts of only $500 or less, or punishment in criminal cases of sixty days, is wasting his ability and the money of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On whom does the gentleman's amendment invest authority?

Mr. DENBY. On the deputy consuls-general in writing by the consul-general without any additional compensation. An appeal will lie in all these cases to the United States court in Shanghai, and it simply relieves the consul-general from a great burden.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Are these courts what are called "courts of first instance," nisi prius courts?

Mr. DENBY. This court I refer to here is a remnant of the judicial power left in the consular court under the extraterritorial jurisdiction exercised by the United States. It corresponds exactly to the justice-court cases in the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does an appeal lie upon their decisions to the American court in China?

Mr. DENBY. It does, and thence to the court in California and the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, not very long ago we enacted some legislation concerning the court to be maintained over in China. I supposed it was fairly well digested. It came from the distinguished committee of which the gentleman is chairman, and I do not think we ought to endeavor on the floor of the House to change that character of legislation.

Mr. DENBY. Mr. Chairman, as to that, I will point out that that court was the first court of that kind ever created under the United States Government. What errors there were it was difficult to foresee and difficult to avoid. And the fact that so few errors were found in the act itself later is evident that it was carefully considered. But we seek now to perfect it simply to this extent, for the relief of the consul-general. It has nothing to do with the court. It keeps the jurisdiction in the same consular body, and merely authorizes the consul-general to transfer the jurisdiction and designate a deputy to try these cases.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think I will insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is proposed new legislation and obnoxious to the rules. Therefore, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill how much of this sum of $1,061,000 is to be used for consuls-general, consuls, consular inspectors, and so on? Last year the bill provided for an appropriation for this service in detail, and this year it provides for it without any detail whatever. Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell us something about it?

Mr. COUSINS. I have not added up the various amounts that go to the consuls-general and consuls, for the reason that a readjustment is now pending in conference, which makes some changes in existing law.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that this appropriation is of sufficient importance to warrant having it made in more detail than it is made in this bill.

Mr. COUSINS. All of their salaries are fixed, the gentleman understands, of course——

Mr. MADDEN. By law?

Mr. COUSINS. Yes; by law.

Mr. MADDEN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For thirteen consular assistants as provided for by law, $18,300; seven additional consular assistants, subject to the same provisions of law as the above thirteen, $7,000; total, $25,300.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Why the necessity for these seven additional consular assistants, who used to be called consular clerks?

Mr. COUSINS. The Department recommended seventeen. These officers are very much needed in the service. The gentleman is probably aware that they begin with a salary of $1,000, receiving that for three years, and after that an increase until they reach $1,800.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, if the gentleman will pardon me, this is an increase of 50 per cent in a year. Why does the increase become necessary? Of course, the Department recommends it.

Mr. COUSINS. They need these men in the various positions because they are among the very best men that we have. They are men that look forward to promotion, and we get better service from them. The service is constantly growing, and while the Department thought there was need of seventeen we thought if we could allow some extra gradually, as we do here, only seven, making the total number only twenty, that that would be progressing with reasonable rapidity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but this is an increase of over 50 per cent—a very sudden rise in one year. What exigency, what new work, has given rise to this new demand?

Mr. COUSINS. I will remind the gentleman that during the first year under the operation of the consular reorganization act, passed at the last Congress, there was saved to the Government 53 per cent by the improvement that we made in the service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We ought to keep on saving, and not go to work——

Mr. COUSINS. We expect by this method to still improve the service and still continue to save.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Where are these consular assistants to be stationed?

Mr. COUSINS. All through the service. They are sent, like emergency men, wherever they are needed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just seven additional consular assistants, to be located according to the discretion of the Department of State?

Mr. DENBY. Where they are most needed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And they have not shown you any new work that has arisen, any special exigencies for them, along with thirteen last year?

Mr. COUSINS. Yes; and we have for several years, but this also aids in what is called "Americanizing" the service. We want to get Americans into the foreign service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, you can not get them in by substitution. It is not necessary to get them in by addition.

Mr. COUSINS. All of these, it is understood, must be Americans, because the salary is the question which requires that they shall be American. The salary amounts to $1,000 a year, and the person appointed must be an American.

Mr. WILLIAMS. These men will substantially take the place of other men, who are not Americans, who are employed at less salary?

Mr. COUSINS. Very largely.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALLOWANCE FOR CLERK HIRE AT UNITED STATES CONSULATES.

Allowance for clerk hire at consulates, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, $242,690: Provided, That the total sum expended in one year shall not exceed the amount appropriated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I reserve the point of order to the proviso, "That the total sum in any one year shall not exceed the amount appropriated." Under the law prior to this, as I understand it, these appropriations were specific allowances of certain amount for such a place and such a place, and going on specifically through the long list. Now, it strikes me Congress has been attempting with all these Departments for a long time to get rid of these lump-sum appropriations that leave so much discretion in the Departments, and have caused the exercise of too little discretion upon the part of the legislative department of the Government, and, besides that, furnish a temptation to men who are in control of Executive Departments to exercise arbitrary power in connection with classification of salaries and placing men. I think I will reserve the point of order to ask the gentleman why his committee should have departed from that policy that seems to have been adopted by the other committees with reference to all the Departments and go back to the discredited policy?

Mr. COUSINS. I want to say to the gentleman that at the last session we agreed upon this plan of consolidating this sum for this purpose, and the Department told us they recommended at this session $33,000 more, or an increase. They told us that if they could have these clerks' pay for the use of these offices they could do for the same amount of money they now have probably what they could do if they had $33,000 more. The argument is this: If a railroad is maintaining a number of stations, as they do, here and there and elsewhere, and if the general manager was limited to expending a certain amount of money for help at these offices, that amount would have to be expended there and he would have no flexibility of service; but if he has a little discretion he can save money at one place where the money is not needed and use it at another place where it is needed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that and how the gentleman's rule will operate, but in that case the railroad people are using their own money in their own discretion, and their discretion will teach them how to use it economically. This is the people's money, used by their agents only, and in making the appropriation of the money by lump sum there is a loss of opportunity and power on our part to identify the Department's expenditures and to keep control over them. The question of specific allowances versus lump-sum appropriations has been argued out fully upon the floor and in committee rooms, and the various committees have pretty well decided that as far as they possibly could they would cut out the lump-sum way of appropriating money, leaving the Executive Departments with discretion to expend it as they chose and losing to Congress the power and the benefit of following up the expenditure of each dollar to each individual purpose, and substitute for it specific appropriations in detail.

Mr. COUSINS. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the larger sums of appropriation, $525,000 for contingent expenses at consulates and a large amount for embassies, are appropriated in a lump sum.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but that is necessary.

Mr. COUSINS. And this is for allowances.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Contingent expenses are uncertain anyhow.

Mr. COUSINS. But they are allowances.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I say, for fixed service and not contingent. The rate of allowance is fixed by law, and the salaries ought to be fixed by law in all cases and in each case, instead of being left, as here, in a lump sum.

Mr. COUSINS. The allowance can not be the same. The amount of service may change and the thing for which the amount of service is required at one place may vary, and all that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that, but Congress has objected to placing this matter in the discretion of the executive officers, which results in the evil that I have just described, the evil of not being able to keep track of these appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is a change of existing law. The appropriation last year, under the head of allowance for clerk hire, I find on pages 22, 23, 24, and 25, and on the top of page 26 of the committee bill. They recite these various places where the clerks are employed and the specific salary at each place. For instance, for allowance for clerk hire at the consulates as follows: London and Paris. $10,000 each, $20,000; Shanghai, $4,500; Hongkong, $3,500, and so on, for three pages.

Now, the point I make is that this appropriation in the mere lump sum, leaving the discretion hitherto not vested in the Secretary of State to fix salaries to suit himself, instead of leaving them as they were fixed by law, is a change of existing law, and is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, if that obtains, that strikes out the appropriation, as I understand it. I ask unanimous consent, then, that the law as it now exists be inserted in place of that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. May I ask whether the Chairman sustained the point of order because of the proviso or because of the form of the appropriation?

The CHAIRMAN. Because of both.

Mr. MANN. Has the Chairman examined the law of last year in reference to it?

The CHAIRMAN. He has not. The Chair takes the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois if he has a suggestion to make.

Mr. MANN. While the allowance for clerk hire last year was in separate amounts, still the law last year fixed what the clerk hire should be in this language:

> From and after the 1st day of July, 1907, the salaries of consular clerks shall be at the rate of $1,000 a year for the first three years of continuous service as such, and shall be increased $200 a year for each succeeding year of continuous service, until the maximum compensation of $1,800 a year shall be reached, and section 1704 of the Revised Statutes and its amendatory act of June 11, 1874, are hereby so amended: Provided, That the salary of no consular clerk herein provided for and now in the service shall be reduced by this act.

Now, it seems to me under that provision of the law the amount of the salary of the consular clerks is fixed and the number of consular clerks is fixed, and that a lump-sum appropriation for these consular clerks in accordance with the law is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Illinois overlooks the fact that the statement here is that the appropriation shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. MANN. That part of it is true, but I was asking the Chair whether the point of order that the Chair had in mind to sustain was to the appropriation being in a lump sum?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all as to the appropriation, but simply as to a change of law.

Mr. MANN. Then I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that he offer as an amendment:

> Allowance for clerk hire at consulates, $242,690.

That covers his case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the point of order to be made to the sum appropriated in the paragraph.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me a moment, I desire to point out that on page 6, in lines 4, 5, and 6 of this bill, exactly the same mode of appropriation is followed. It reads:

> For the employment of necessary clerks at the embassies and legations, who, whenever hereafter appointed, shall be citizens of the United States, $65,000.

It being in the nature of a general appropriation, governed by the specific law of last year.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer as an amendment the following:

> Allowance for clerk hire at consulates, $242,690.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

> Insert after line 24, page 19, the following:
> "Allowance for clerk hire at consulates, $242,690."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. PAYNE. A point of order on what?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order twofold: First, that even if this were an original motion, it would be a change of existing law; and secondly, that the gentleman's amendment is merely to restore to the bill precisely that which a moment ago was stricken out of the bill on a point of order. So the point of order against it is twofold, being well taken in itself and as having just been virtually sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. What was stricken out was not because it was subject alone to the point of order, but because of the context. It is competent for the gentleman to insert that which is not subject to a point of order, the amendment which he is now offering.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I make the point of order that it is subject to the point of order of being itself a change of existing law.

Mr. MANN. The paragraph was clearly subject to a point of order. It contains two provisions, one a proviso that the total sum expended in one year should not exceed the amount appropriated, and the other a provision of law requiring the money to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State. It is competent for Congress to make an appropriation for clerks for consulates, the salary and number of whom have been provided by law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman seems to think that because he strikes out the words "under the direction of the Secretary of State" that therefore he has stricken out the discretion proposed to be vested by the amendment in the Secretary of State, which was the gravamen of the point of order.

The fact that this provision, stricken out of the bill by my point of order, vested in the discretion of the Secretary of State certain payments fixed by law as being specifically allowed by Congress. Notwithstanding the fact you strike out the words "under the direction of the Secretary of State," without inserting other words limiting his discretion to the former act of Congress, vests in him the discretion. For example, the consular agents at London and Paris by law are paid $10,000 each. Now, if the gentleman's amendment is passed, it will clearly lie in the power of the Secretary of State, if he wishes, to pay the one at London $12,000 and the one at Paris $8,000, so that there would be a giving to him of discretion to vary the salary now fixed by law. If you say, as the amendment reads, "allowances for clerk hire at consulates, $242,690"—in a lump sum—without any words specifying to what particular purpose any part of the total amount should go or even citing present law, you necessarily repeal enough of the old law to leave the discretion in the Secretary of State, by classification and arrangement, to dictate the method and proportion of its expenditures.

Mr. MANN. Quite the contrary. If the provision of the bill gives the Secretary of State the discretion, he has the discretion. If the bill only gives the item of appropriation, it must be expended in accordance with law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi made a point of order against the provision "allowance for clerk hire at consulates, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, $242,690: Provided, That the total sum expended in one year shall not exceed the amount appropriated."

Now, it is perfectly clear that that paragraph, as the Chair has read it, is a change of existing law, and therefore the Chair sustained the point of order; but it is not only competent but proper that Congress should make an allowance for clerk hire at consulates, and the amendment proposing to make such allowance or appropriation is not subject to a point of order unless it proposes to make some change in the salary.

Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois proposes to make the allowance for clerk hire of a certain amount of money, which is to be expended in accordance with existing law, and is, therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, not subject to a point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose the amendment passed and became a law, would it not be true that the Secretary of State could under it fix the amount of the salary for the consular agent at London at $11,000 and the agent at Paris at $9,000, and is it not true that now their respective salaries are fixed at $10,000 by law?

The CHAIRMAN. If what the gentleman from Illinois read to the Chair is existing law, and he assumes that it is, the appropriation must be expended by the Secretary of State in accordance therewith.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I thought the opinion of the Chair correct—that the Secretary of State could not under this amendment change or vary the salaries as fixed by law—I should, of course, have no objection to the amendment.

Moreover, the very object and purpose of the Secretary of State in fixing the language that is in the bill now, as explained by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, would be defeated, because he said that the object was to be able to make elastic and to vary these salaries at various places—to make one higher than it now is and another lower than it now is—to satisfy the exigencies of the service. If he can do that under the amendment, then, plainly, he can change existing salaries, and, plainly, therefore, this amendment giving him discretion to do it is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that under the amendment he can do that, and therefore overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

RELIEF AND PROTECTION OF AMERICAN SEAMEN.

Relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, and shipwrecked American seamen in the Territory of Alaska, in the Hawaiian Islands, Porto Rico, the Panama Canal Zone, and the Philippine Islands, $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether he has received any complaints that the sum now being appropriated for the purpose of relief and protection of shipwrecked American seamen is insufficient for that purpose? Have some of them been left unrelieved and not sent home because of lack of appropriations?

Mr. COUSINS. I think not. I have the amounts that have been expended for the last two or three years. In 1905 the amount was $25,573.81; in 1906, $25,726.89; in 1907, $36,799.55.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The appropriation in the bill is $30,000. Last year they actually expended $36,000. Evidently this is about $6,000 short of what it ought to be. I ask because I have received some complaints——

Mr. COUSINS. It is all the Department of State asks.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is all the Department asks?

Mr. COUSINS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I shall not move to increase it, but I have received some complaints that sailors have received answer that the appropriation was exhausted and no money available. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENT EXPENSES, UNITED STATES CONSULATES.

Expenses of providing all such stationery, blanks, record and other books, seals, presses, flags, signs, rent (allowance for rent not to exceed in any case 30 per cent of the officers' salary), postage, furniture, statistics, newspapers, freight (foreign and domestic), telegrams, advertising, messenger service, traveling expenses of consular officers and consular assistants, compensation of Chinese writers, loss by exchange, and such other miscellaneous expenses as the President may think necessary for the several consulates and consular agencies in the transaction of their business, $525,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that part of the paragraph beginning after the word "rent," in line 17, page 22, and ending on line 18, of the same page, with the word "salary," and I ask the chairman of the committee to tell the House——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph also.

Mr. MADDEN (continuing). To tell the House why the allowance for rent is increased from 20 to 30 per cent. It seems to me that this is a very large increase, and there ought to be some reason as to why it is made.

Mr. COUSINS. The present limit of allowance is 20 per cent, and has been so since 1856. As a matter of fact, the cost for rent has increased very rapidly throughout the world, much more rapidly than the salaries, and there are several places where we were unable to secure a place at all during the last year.

Mr. MADDEN. The fact is that under the reorganization of the consular service the salaries of all those engaged in that service have been increased.

Mr. COUSINS. Not all.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, almost all. If that be true, 30 per cent of the salary list for rent would mean much more than one-third additional to the expense for that purpose, because 20 per cent of the original salary would be very much less than 30 per cent of the present salary.

Mr. COUSINS. The salaries have been increased very little. If the gentleman will take the consular reorganization act, he will find that the advances were very small, indeed. Of course you do not have to expend 30 per cent of the salary for rent. It is just as discretionary as the present law at 20 per cent. That law was passed in 1856.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As a matter of fact, it will be expended.

Mr. COUSINS. Oh, no; they do not now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They spend the whole 20 per cent now, do they not?

Mr. COUSINS. No. It is just as discretionary under the law as it exists and will be if it is 30 per cent.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that they do not expend the 20 per cent?

Mr. COUSINS. No; they do not.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, why is it necessary to have 30 per cent?

Mr. COUSINS. Because in some places it is impossible to get a building at 20 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And in other places it is possible for less?

Mr. COUSINS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. There is an increase of $175,000 in the amount.

Mr. COUSINS. This fund is the only way we have of not only securing better places and better accommodations, but it is the only way we have of securing furniture and fixtures.

Mr. MADDEN. How much does this 10 per cent additional amount to?

Mr. COUSINS. Well, the average now is about $400 to a consulate.

Mr. MADDEN. How many consulates are there, all told?

Mr. COUSINS. There are 310, at 10 per cent——

Mr. MADDEN. This would amount to about $60,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Last year it was $325,000, so 10 per cent would be $32,500.

Mr. COUSINS. I present this matter to the gentleman's benevolent consideration.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 92, noes 48.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 20345) making appropriation for the diplomatic and consular service, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules, agree to the amendments, and pass the bill as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to suspend the rules, agree to the amendments, and pass the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, upon that motion I demand a second.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, forced by a sense of duty and the inactivity of a Republican Congress in the matter of remedial legislation——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that those remarks of the gentleman should not go in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York on yesterday injected some remarks twice——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the regular order, and we will have the regular order, and the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Mississippi will take their places as tellers.

The House divided, and the tellers [Mr. COUSINS and Mr. WILLIAMS] reported that there were—ayes 97, noes 51.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Iowa to twenty minutes.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa reserves his time. The gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if I can make a compromise with the House now I would like to do it. Instead of speaking twenty minutes upon this particular bill, I would like to touch up the wood-pulp question for about five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Regular order is demanded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, Mr. Speaker, if that is ruled out, I would like to say that I would then be willing to effect this compromise; I would be willing to spend five minutes in examining into the reasons why a publicity bill for campaign contributions does not come out of the Committee on Election of the President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman should confine himself to the question before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I submit to the point of order, if it is well taken. Then I would add this, that I would like, if I dreamed that I could, for about five minutes to dwell upon another question. I should feel exceedingly happy—five minutes to enforce the wisdom of passing a bill which has——

Mr. DALZELL. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman does not know to what bill I was about to allude.

Mr. DALZELL. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I submit, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman does not know from what I said on what to make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is called to order. The gentleman from Mississippi understands the rules of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; the "gentleman from Mississippi" also understands——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Chair point out what words of "the gentleman," just uttered, and concerning which the point of order is made, are not in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi will suspend. Under the rules of the House, the gentleman is called to order by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. Now, I want to discuss the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi understands perfectly well what the rules provide, and that it is not subject to debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; but it is.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman from Mississippi is not proceeding in order. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the gentleman from Mississippi will proceed in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, then, having no right to argue the point of order, for the purpose of a parliamentary inquiry——

The SPEAKER. It is in the discretion of the Chair. The Chair does not desire to hear any argument. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. One further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Speaker will be patient, because I am of an investigating turn of mind and trying to learn as I proceed. The Chair tells me it is in his discretion to determine that it is not necessary to hear argument. Does the Speaker say that his discretion is a judicial or an arbitrary discretion?

The SPEAKER. In the Speaker's discretion, under the rules of the House, on points of order, if the Chair does not desire to hear discussion he decides the point of order; and the Chair in this instance has not any doubt whatever, nor has the gentleman from Mississippi any doubt.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Perhaps the Speaker did not hear my attempted remarks upon the point of order made, which were to the effect that I had not proceeded far enough in my last sentence for either the gentleman from Pennsylvania or anybody else to know.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not care to hear the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, then, I would like to say this, as germane to the question and the procedure now: I find myself enjoined, as it were, by the point of order and by the Speaker from proceeding to dwell upon the subject I wanted to dwell upon. Finding myself enjoined in this manner, perhaps it would be in order to talk about the law of injunctions, and I submit that as a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the rules will be enforced. The gentleman has been called to order three times, and it is time for him to take his seat.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall now proceed in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi will have the kindness to be seated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, I confessed the point of order well taken.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is made, and the gentleman will please be seated until it is disposed of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order and appeals to the gentleman from Mississippi that under the rules of the House he proceed in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall now proceed in order, Mr. Speaker, by saying in closing the argument I have just made against the motion to suspend the rules and pass the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill that, having accomplished the purpose for which I arose, I will now reserve the balance of my time and yield any of it to anybody upon this side who may desire it. Does anybody want three or five minutes upon this motion?

There seems to be no one desiring it, Mr. Speaker; and having accomplished my purpose by making the announcements of policy I wanted to make, I now yield the balance of my time to the Speaker himself.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules, agree to the amendments, and pass the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 34, noes 78.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 166, nays 26, answered "present" 9, not voting 186, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, April 19, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God and our Father, who hath made us a little less than divine, and hast crowned us with glory and honor, we thank Thee for all the disclosures Thou hast made of Thyself in the great Book of Nature, the sun which shines by day, the moon and the stars which shine by night, the change of seasons, seedtime and harvest, and the wonderful adaptation of means to ends.

Surely Thou openest Thy hand and satisfieth the desire of every living thing. Especially do we thank Thee for Thy Son, Jesus Christ, His life, death, and resurrection, through whom Thou hast revealed Thine own heart to the world, which palpitates with eternal love and affection for all Thy children, and that we can never go where Thou art not. "If I ascend up into Heaven, Thou art there; if I make my bed in the grave, behold Thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall Thy hand lead me and Thy right hand shall hold me."

We rejoice, O Lord our God, with all the world this day in the resurrection of Thy Son, Jesus Christ, which proves the strength and power of life over death.

We are met here to pay a tribute of love and respect to one who served with distinction upon the floor of this House. We thank Thee for his patriotism, for his citizenship, for his public service, and we most fervently pray for all who are bound to him by the ties of kinship, love, and affection. Let the Everlasting Arms be about them, and especially do we pray for his companion who walked by his side, sharing his joys and sorrows, his victories and defeats. Help her to look forward to the resurrection morn, which shall be for all of us, and pæans of praise we shall ever give to Thee in Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, April 6, was read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will take the chair.

Mr. MADDEN assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE GEORGE W. SMITH, OF ILLINOIS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. THISTLEWOOD. Mr. Speaker, on the 4th day of March last I introduced in this House a resolution by unanimous consent fixing the hour of 12 o'clock, Sunday, April 19, for the hearing of eulogies on the life, character, and public services of Congressman GEORGE W. SMITH, late a Member of this House and long an honored representative of the Twenty-fifth District of Illinois.

It is not my purpose to make any extended remarks as to his Congressional services here, but rather, in what I shall have to say, confine myself to his youthful days, to his early struggles, and to his determination to educate himself so as to be fitted to meet the responsibilities of life.

I propose to leave for you who have served with him here so long and who know how faithful he was to his district, to his State, and to his country, the opportunity of speaking of his splendid services as a legislator.

The life and public service of Congressman SMITH were in many respects remarkable. He was of humble parentage. His father, James Smith, came from Scotland and settled in Ohio at an early date. His mother's maiden name was Agnes Morton, and she was a native of Ohio. Congressman SMITH was one of a family of ten children, six boys and four girls. He was born in Ohio August 18, 1846. His father early emigrated to Indiana, and later settled in Illinois in 1851. The parents of Congressman SMITH were of that hardy class of pioneers who were the early settlers of Illinois, and who pushed forward before the days of the railroads and helped to make Illinois one of the great States of the American Union.

His father took up land in Wayne County, and proceeded to make for himself and family a home in what was then a comparative wilderness. His neighbors were few and far between; houses were to be built; the land was to be cleared, broken, and inclosed. In this work all would join; while the father would fell the trees the mother and children would gather and burn the brush; or, while the father would hold the plow the remainder of the family would plant the crop. Thus all contributed to the wealth and maintenance of the household.

The schools in those days in Illinois were very primitive. The children of the Smith household attended school only for a short time during the winter months, being compelled to help the mother in the house and the father in the field during the spring and summer.

Congressman SMITH when a small boy was a hard worker and a hard student. He gave early evidence of a desire to educate himself. He studied and worked, and worked and studied. He was untiring in his efforts; all the time adding to his store of knowledge.

He early learned the trade of blacksmithing, and by working on the farm and at his trade he was enabled to save up enough money to take a course in the literary department of McKendree College, at Lebanon, Ill. Later he began reading law, and graduated from the law school of Bloomington, Ind., in 1870, and was admitted in the same year to practice in Illinois by the supreme court. He located at Murphysboro, and soon took a leading place as an attorney in Jackson County and in the then Eighteenth Congressional District.

His ambition as a boy and as a man was to go to Congress, and when he had attained that ambition he seemed satisfied. In 1880 he was elected on the Republican ticket as the elector for the Eighteenth District and cast his vote for President Garfield.

In 1888 he received the Republican nomination for Congress and was elected by a handsome majority, thus reaching the goal of his ambition, and he continuously served in Congress from that time until his death, being always elected by very large majorities.

On December 29, 1884, Congressman SMITH was married to Miss M. Alice Dailey, of Murphysboro, Ill. Mrs. Smith had two brothers and one sister, all of whom, together with her parents, have passed away, she being the only surviving member of her immediate family; and it is particularly sad to relate that the next day after her husband's death her father also died, and both were buried on the same day, the father in Missouri, the husband in Illinois.

Those of you who have served with Congressman SMITH here, and who know how faithful he was to every obligation imposed on him, are better fitted than I am to speak of his official life; but my long acquaintance with him in relation to the people whom he so efficiently served gives me an insight into his character and enables me to speak of that close bond of friendship which existed at all times between him and the people of his district.

I think I may say that no complaint was too trivial for him to investigate, and no letter was ever received by him that did not receive an answer couched in the most gracious language. Congressman SMITH was not only strong in his party, but he had hosts of friends in the opposite party that voted for him as regularly as did his party friends.

I think I may say that he had no ambition for any political honors outside of his Congressional district, being content to serve his constituents, and for their interest to devote all his time.

A very strong bond of friendship existed between him and the veterans of the great war. He was their friend and they were his friends. A great part of his time was devoted to aiding the veteran soldiers and seeing that they secured the pensions due them from the Government.

Congressman SMITH died November 30, 1907, at his home in Murphysboro, where he had resided for nearly forty years, attended by his devoted wife and surrounded by his intimate friends of Murphysboro and Jackson County. Besides his wife, he left an elder sister, Mrs. Margaret Pucket, who now lives near the old homestead in Wayne County.

The people of Jackson County and of the entire district will miss Congressman SMITH. He was charitable and benevolent, gentle and kind, always cheerful, always doing something to contribute to the happiness of others. He was a devoted husband. His honesty of purpose and his integrity were well known; his life and work, public and private, were above reproach. He was successful as an attorney and gave satisfaction as a public servant, as attested by his being elected ten successive terms from his district. His constituents appreciated his services and delighted to honor him. His disposition and eagerness to serve them, regardless of politics, were well known, and therein was much of his strength. One of his chief characteristics was his attention to the little things in life, small things and kindnesses, thoughtfulness of deeds in which few men in their busy spheres of life ever take time to think of. He was thoughtful, kind, loving, and gentle as a woman. Those who knew him well best appreciated his sterling worth.

When a good man dies,
Upon whose honored name
There rest no flaw, no blame,
No heartless, cruel shame,
No tarnish to his fame;
We can not count the cost,
Nor reckon what we've lost,
When a good man dies.

When a good man dies,
Whose nobleness succeeds
To bless the many needs
And cheer the heart that bleeds
With high, unselfish deeds;
We can not count the cost,
Nor reckon what we've lost,
When a good man dies.

When a good man dies,
Whose name can proudly stand
Whose memory can command
The tribute, sweet and grand,
An honor to the land;
We can not count the cost,
Nor reckon what we've lost,
When a good man dies.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Speaker, as a rule obituaries, eulogies, and epitaphs are discounted. We are too apt to employ extravagance when we speak or write of our friends whose passing we mourn. In what I have to say on this occasion of my late colleague, GEORGE W. SMITH, I shall speak with knowledge of his private character and public services, based upon a close acquaintance with his career, and I believe that my estimate of the man will not be mixed with fulsome flattery or inordinate eulogy. The looms that construct the warp and woof of time are never idle. Their tireless, incessant weaving is seen in the threads and colors that make up our several lives, and when the light of criticism is turned upon them the whole world may make the final analysis, thus discovering the defects and the beauties of the workmanship. And so in a few brief sentences I shall endeavor to epitomize the story of some of the characteristics of our friend's life as they come to me.

GEORGE W. SMITH was a native of Putnam County, Ohio, where he was born on the 18th day of August, 1846. When he was 4 years old his parents went to Illinois. There he learned the trade of blacksmithing, but, like Elihu Burritt, the great thinker and patriot, he soon broke away from the restrictions of the anvil and forge to make his way to the professional pursuits of life. After attending the common schools he graduated from McKendree College in 1868. At this time he became ambitious to study and master the law, and following that inclination he was graduated at the University of Bloomington, Ind., 1870, being admitted to practice by the supreme court of Illinois the same year, after which he practiced his profession in his home town of Murphysboro. He was a master in the details of organization, and one of the keenest judges of men that I have ever met; therefore his way to political paths was easy and natural.

In 1880, as an elector for his Congressional district, the old Twentieth, he cast his vote for Garfield and Arthur, and in 1888 he was elected to a seat in this body. From the Fifty-first Congress until his death, which occurred at his home November 30, 1907, he was returned at each election, thus rounding out a splendid service of over eighteen years. This long and continuous service is in itself a magnificent tribute to the estimate placed upon his worth by the constituency which he served so faithfully and so well. To aspire to membership in the Congress of the United States is an honor worthy of the ambition of any man, but to have occupied a seat in the nation's councils for almost a generation is an honor never achieved by any but the truest, the bravest, and the best.

Mr. Speaker, the crowning virtue and capstone of GEORGE W. SMITH'S character was his transparent honesty and singleness. He was the very soul of honor, the personification of loyalty. The mask of an actor never fitted him. He knew naught of expediency, and he was never known to temporize. The dominant trait of his public and private life was a sincere devotion to the highest and best ideals of patriotic citizenship. In all the vicissitudes of his eventful career he followed ever the path of duty, outlined clearly and unmistakably by a conscience that was responsive always to the noblest impulses of true manhood. Men who really knew him recognized his robust virtues and admired them. They likewise discerned his faults and merged them into his manly qualities, because he wore them both upon his breast. And thus he had grown upon his friends, his constituents, and his colleagues as one who might fitly use as his own the words which Homer puts in the mouth of the hero of his Iliad:

For I hate with perfect hatred.
Hate him like the gates of hell,
Who within him one thought harbors
While his lips another tell.

Above all, beyond it all, our friend possessed the attributes of a man that "stood four square to all the winds that blew." Mr. Speaker, we glory in our material greatness, our unequaled empire with its 90,000,000 freemen, our growth in wealth and culture, the dazzling sweep of mechanical ingenuity and invention, our beautiful cities, and our railroads and electrical appliances. But let us not forget to keep uppermost in our thoughts that after all the man is greater, higher than them all, the man is more than the great city, more than all of the combination of modern methods and conveniences of our wonderful twentieth century, more than the ingenuity of human thought and genius will ever attain.

Our friend was a firm believer in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. In the daily walks of life he practiced faith, hope, and charity, which are the divine characteristics of every manly heart. He was an ardent adherent to the beautiful teachings of Masonry, having been honored by that order many times. He had made the pleasant journey that led him through the York rite, which is the corner stone and essence of all Masonry. He presided over his lodge several times, a record to which he pointed with much pleasure. Here he was taught and believed with his whole soul that the man who so conducts the order of his life that when the summons comes that beckons him over into the eternal morning, leaving a marked imprint for good or traits of character worthy of record, that man has not lived for himself alone, but that his life was worth all the tears and trouble of the living. And such a life may fitly be said to be like "a tree planted by the rivers of water that bringeth forth fruit in season, whose leaves shall not wither," and whom no evil can befall, whether it be alive or dead.

Our departed colleague's veneration of and unmixed gratitude to the men who marched away during the war of the rebellion in defense of the flag and who kept that flag from dishonor were a part of his faith. He made several attempts to enter the Army, but failed because of his immature age and by reason of physical infirmities. This was ever a matter of regret to him, but his interest in those who made it possible for this Government to exist was a continuing, earnest one. His warm heart answered in generous sympathy the admiration that came from all over his district from soldiers, their widows and orphans. Patiently and consistently he contended for their rights, pressing with passionate interest the claims of the broken soldier and the debt owing to him by that nation which he served so well. To him the vanishing Army of Blue was full of pathetic interest. He saw them marching away until the purple hills that divide us from the Valley of the Shadow are crowded with those who became weary of the long march, at the termination of which they will again repeat the dear old war refrain, "We are coming, Father Abraham," as they enter the ever-swinging curtains of the waiting skies and meet him, the apotheosis of freedom's holy light, whose incomparable career has not been approached since the angels sang at Bethlehem and wept at Calvary's crime—their Lincoln, the world's Lincoln.

In the historic little city of Murphysboro we laid our friend away on that gray autumn day, the season that typifies the end of Nature's beautiful products, amid the tears of those he loved. The solemn scenes of that sad, sad day have left an impress on my memory which time can not efface. With bowed heads and sobbing hearts his friends and neighbors by the thousands followed the funeral cortege as it slowly wound its way through the streets of the mourning city to the little cemetery on the hill. There we left him to hurry out into the busy, throbbing, forgetful world, wondering who of us will closely follow and meet him—

Where no storms ever beat on the glittering strand,
And the years of eternity roll.

Mr. Speaker, we can not force our vision through the mists and shadows that separate us from our dead. We stand in the mysterious, solemn silence, and there is no sound save the quickened heart beat; but the cable of hope, of faith intertwined with roses, reaches "beyond the smiling and the weeping." Over it we may send our messages of love and with the listening ear of trust that comes from the Master we can hear the response from across the shoreless sea, saying:

All is well.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that it is quite unusual for a new Member of this House to take part in memorial meetings of this kind, and especially where the new Member comes from a different State than that formerly represented by the deceased Member, but when the light is shed upon our past relations, I hope that my remarks at this time will not be considered inappropriate, nor my appearance an unbecoming intrusion on my part.

I have known Mr. GEORGE W. SMITH for many years, and although we lived in different States, we were in fact neighbors and friends, and in many respects our paths in life were similar and parallel. He was reared upon an Illinois farm, I upon a Missouri farm. We both entered the legal profession early in life, and for more than a quarter of a century we practiced law in adjoining circuits, but in different States.

In 1880 Mr. SMITH was a Presidential elector, and voted for Mr. Garfield, a Republican President, and in 1884 I was an elector and voted for Mr. Cleveland, a Democratic President. At the time of his death we represented in Congress adjoining districts, separated only by the Mississippi River, and while that great river separated us physically and geographically, a common interest in its improvement and welfare served to draw us nearer together officially and as friends.

Mr. SMITH and I were members of the same party of mutual friends from his district and mine, who, on board the steamboat Dick Fowler, accompanied President Roosevelt and his party on his recent trip down the Mississippi River. This great flotilla, consisting of seventeen boats, parading in orderly procession from St. Louis to Memphis, was, without question, the greatest and most imposing spectacle ever witnessed in the history of Mississippi River navigation, and emphasized to all the world the growing commercial importance of that mighty stream.

The several days that Mr. SMITH and I were thus thrown together on this extended trip, with frequent opportunities to personally converse, enable me to know better and to appreciate more fully his true worth and the noble characteristics of his life.

He was as gentle and sympathetic as a child, and still as determined and steadfast in his purposes as a military chieftain. He was always grateful and loyal to his friends, without regard to their influence or station in life, and, above all, his life was consecrated to the faithful discharge of his duties as a public servant.

The welfare of his constituents was to him the supreme law of his official action, and it at no time suffered any infraction by any willful act of his.

These, with many other good qualities, made him strong with the people of his district. He was, in fact, invincible to all opponents in his own party, and stronger than his party in the general elections.

I remember quite well our last separation at Cairo, when he said to me that he would be very glad to meet me in Washington City at the opening of this Congress, and would take great pleasure in assisting me in any way that he could in the discharge of my new duties as a Member of this House. I thanked him then for his generous offer, and now that he is gone I shall gratefully remember this kindly expression of his friendship and esteem.

How uncertain is life! How often it is that death intervenes and interferes with the calculations of men. Instead of meeting him here at the opening of this sesssion of Congress, and seeing his familiar face and enjoying again the friendly grasp of his hand, I was on the opening day shocked by the information of his death, and was at that time appointed by the Speaker of this House a member of the committee to attend his funeral in his home State.

We witnessed there, at his home in Murphysboro, many and unmistakable evidences of the secure and warm place he held in the hearts of his people. The city was in mourning, all business was practically suspended, special trains brought hundreds of his friends from all parts of his district; his Masonic brethren came from all parts of the State; the streets about the Logan House were crowded by a sorrowing multitude, unable to gain admission or to hear the beautiful and touching tribute to his memory expressed by the Reverend Doctor Flint, an old boyhood friend, and Mr. RODENBERG, his close personal friend and former colleague in this body.

The people of his home city seemed to perfectly realize the fact that they had in his death not only lost their most distinguished citizen, but their benefactor and friend; and their presence, their tears, and the many floral offerings all testified to the sincerity of their professions and the depth of their grief.

Our friend was laid to rest in the presence of thousands of his former constituents, neighbors, fraternal associates, and friends, by the Masonic fraternity, with their beautiful funeral service at the grave, which again impressed us all with the uncertainty of this life and of the frailties of all things mortal.

Our Masonic brethren sometimes compare human life to the hour-glass, and the comparison is striking and appropriate:

Behold how the grains of sand contained in this machine pass away almost imperceptibly, and yet in one short hour they are all exhausted. So wastes man. To-day he puts forth the tender buds of hope; to-morrow he blooms and bears his honors thick upon him; the next day the chilling frosts of death destroy all, and while he thinks his greatness is still aspiring he falls like autumn leaves, to enrich our mother earth.

But we were reminded by the evergreen, deposited by hundreds of the fraternity in the grave with the mortal remains of our departed brother, that—

There is in man an immortal spark which bears a close affinity to the Supreme Architect of the universe that shall never die. This enables all good Masons to look forward with hope and confidence to a blessed immortality beyond the grave, and we doubt not that on the resurrection morn our bodies shall rise up and become as incorruptible as the soul.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, among the men who have represented the State of Illinois in the National Congress since its admission into the Union, GEORGE W. SMITH was one of the few who had been honored by his district with a long, continued, and uninterrupted service. Had he lived to the expiration of the Sixtieth Congress, he would have been in continuous service for twenty years. During this time the nation has made more progress in the family of nations than in any other corresponding period of its history. He was born in the State of Ohio August 18, 1846. When four years of age his father removed to Wayne County, Ill. He was reared on a farm, attended the common schools, learned the blacksmith's trade, worked his way through McKendree College, at Lebanon, Ill., graduating in 1868, read law in a country lawyer's office at Fairfield, Ill., in his home county, and from there he went to the university at Bloomington, Ind., receiving his law degree in 1870, was admitted to practice in the same year, moved to Murphysboro, Jackson County, Ill., and began his life work as a lawyer. In the active practice of his profession he attained considerable distinction, and was regarded by his associates at the bar with that respect and confidence to which his legal abilities entitled him, and had he remained in the practice of law, no doubt he would have attained a high position in the profession, for he was painstaking, careful, studious, and always watchful of every interest of his clients, and above all, was regarded as thoroughly honest in everything pertaining to his profession. The profession of law, especially in a country town, naturally leads to politics, and in the case of Mr. SMITH it was to be expected that he, sooner or later, would become a candidate for political honors, for he had every incentive, both by nature and surroundings, to cause him to seek the political arena as a field for his future operations.

He was a fluent talker, a splendid organizer, a clear thinker, a good judge of men, and had that very necessary and important faculty which every successful public man must possess, of surrounding himself with loyal friends. And in addition to this, the county he had chosen for his residence had been the home of John A. Logan, who became famous during the period of the civil war both as a Congressman and volunteer soldier, and who afterwards, as a Senator from Illinois, served his country with equally as great ability in civil life as he had served it in military life. Living in these surroundings, it was natural that a man with the ability and standing which Mr. SMITH had acquired in his profession should have a desire to emulate the example of his distinguished neighbor and fellow-citizen. He was a candidate for the nomination three times on the Republican ticket for Congress before he succeeded. He was successful as a candidate for the nomination to the Fifty-first Congress, was elected, and was a Member continuously until his death. The indomitable will and persistent effort to accomplish his purpose when once he had made up his mind is clearly shown in his overcoming the handicap of three sucessive defeats before he attained his goal. There are but few aspirants in the political world who have shown sufficient courage and confidence in ultimate success to put forth another effort after meeting with so many reverses as he did before securing the position he sought. This phase of his character was one of the predominant features of his private and public life. When once he made up his mind that a thing was right and ought to be done, nothing swerved him from his purpose, and his life's history shows that he usually accomplished all of his undertakings.

I knew Mr. SMITH personally before he came to Congress, and was identified with him in some of his early political struggles. I was his constituent during fourteen years of his service in Congress, and I have the privilege and the honor now of representing four of the counties that formerly belonged to the district which he represented. He was my personal friend, and when I was elected to the Fifty-ninth Congress and came here inexperienced in the methods of procedure and unacquainted with the duties which I was expected to perform, it was from Mr. SMITH, my former Congressman and friend, that I sought advice and information, and I owe a debt of gratitude to him for the many favors shown me. For he was kind and considerate and took time from his own duties to explain and show me how to accomplish those things which every Representative must learn, either by experience or by the advice of others, and which he was eminently qualified to do from his long experience and large store of information on all the subjects affecting our national life. In equipping himself for the discharge of his duties as Representative, Mr. SMITH did not confine himself alone to studying the institutions of his own country. He perhaps had traveled as extensively as any other Member of Congress. As a member of the Insular Committee he felt the necessity of visiting our island possessions, that he might acquaint himself at first hand, so that he could be better prepared to understand and legislate upon the propositions which are continually being presented in regard to them. In pursuance of this plan he had visited the Philippines, Porto Rico, Hawaii, Alaska, and the Canal Zone, and no one of my acquaintance could talk more intelligently and furnish more information upon the practical questions arising out of our island possessions than Mr. SMITH.

His extensive travels had given him a breadth of mind and a vast amount of information which enabled him to grapple with and solve with ease the many problems which are continually arising in our national affairs. He had no personal pride in in his own opinions, and was willing to receive advice and information from others, but after once making up his mind he was firm in his convictions and steadfast in his purposes. As his constituent for many years and colleague during a portion of his Congressional career, I never knew or heard of any adverse criticisms from members of his own party of any of the many votes he cast upon public questions, so careful was he to thoroughly inform himself before casting his vote.

As was evidenced by his long-continued service in Congress, he was held in high esteem by his constituents. But few men in public life were more trusted and loved by the people they represent than he, and in return he was a believer in the people and early in his Congressional career there was adopted in his district, at his suggestion, a system of primary elections for the nomination which gave each member of his party an opportunity to express his choice for candidates. This voluntary primary adopted many years ago in his district has been, with very little amendment, lately enacted into a law which now governs the nomination for all candidates in the State of Illinois. A great many of his constituents were soldiers of the civil war, and during his entire service in Congress he was their constant, loyal, and true friend, at all times ready and willing to render them any service possible. As the "soldiers' friend," he was known and honored throughout southern Illinois, and he richly deserved the title, for few have been the men who have been able to accomplish more for the soldiers of his district than Mr. SMITH. In return for this service he was loved, honored, and trusted by the soldiers, regardless of politics, in his district, and this fact was strongly exemplified at his funeral by the long line of members of the Grand Army of the Republic which marched at the head of the funeral procession, following to his last resting place one who, though not their comrade, had earned the right to honorary burial as such by his unselfish efforts and untiring energy in their behalf.

In his private life he was genial, hospitable, and generous. He was always ready to lend a helping hand to the unfortunate, and no one ever appealed to him in time of trouble who did not receive his advice and assistance. His heart was kind and sympathetic, and it seemed impossible for him to say "No" to any worthy one appealing to him in adversity. He died poor in the possession of the goods of this world, but rich in the esteem of his fellow-men, to which his high standard of living and conscientious devotion to truth and justice entitled him. His word was his bond, and was so taken and accepted both in his political life and in his dealings with his fellow-man. I was a member of the committee of the House that attended his burial at his home in Murphysboro, Ill. A profound sorrow was over the little city. The business houses were closed out of respect for the occasion, and a large number of his constituents, friends, and neighbors gathered to pay a last sad tribute to his mortal remains. From every county in his district came large delegations, all of them his personal friends and knew him well, to show the high esteem in which he was held by all of his constituents. He was buried under the auspices of the Masonic fraternity, of which he had been a devoted and honored member for many years, and the large number of the brethren of this order which gathered to pay the last sad rites to his memory attested the high standing in which he was held by the fraternity. May his memory ever be fresh in the affections of his friends and of the people who honored and loved him as their Representative and whom he served and loved so well.

Mr. LOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, again we are met to pay our tribute of affection and respect to a departed friend.

When we separated last spring, GEORGE W. SMITH had as good a right to expect many years of useful life as any of us who are here to-day. But suddenly Death met him face to face, and he went out from our midst, leaving many heavy hearts. I knew him well and loved him much.

The district he represented was the old Logan district. It was from this district that John A. Logan enlisted in the war with Mexico. It was from this district that Colonel Logan, resigning his seat in Congress, set out in the early days of the civil war on that career which was to lead him to immortal fame as the most illustrious citizen-soldier of the century. Under the tutelage of that great man GEORGE W. SMITH received his first lessons in politics. It was to be expected, then, that fidelity in all relations should be, as it was, a distinguishing quality of his life.

Southern Illinois is remarkable in this, that more than anywhere else, so far as I know, the Puritan of New England and the cavalier of the South met face to face, and in the rivalry between them only the best qualities of each survived.

The virtues of the North and the virtues of the South, mingling, produced a well-nigh perfect type of man. This people is patriotic in the extreme, but always sane. They are brave, but modest. They are hearty, but unaffected. They are hospitable, but simple. They are shrewd, but fair. If you would win their affections, you must first gain their respect. A more interesting people can nowhere be found. And when you have once visited southern Illinois you will not be content until you return. And when you have gone back you will feel at home.

Modest beyond most, it was given only to the family and closest friends of GEORGE W. SMITH to know his manly worth. But he who once was fortunate enough to gain his friendship could count on him in all times, whether of good report or bad report. Warm-hearted and loyal, like the great constituency he represented here so faithfully and well for a generation, he will be greatly missed in this House and in Illinois.

And what words of sympathy may we speak to the devoted wife, who mourns him most of all? I know that I utter the sentiment of all his friends here and his friends at home when I say that she has been much in our thoughts since the separation came. We know that any spoken words of ours can not assuage her grief, and that only from on high can comfort come to her wounded heart. May the Father of us all be very tender to the sorrowing companion of his earthly days. May she find peace in the glorious hope of a reunion beyond the grave.

Not affecting brilliancy of speech, but relying upon industry and good common sense, Representative SMITH served his people and his country well.

I have been many times in his district. He had an affectionate hold upon his constituents which nothing could shake loose. He trusted them and they believed in him. When the hour struck and he passed from mortal sight, the people of southern Illinois mourned the loss not only of their distinguished Representative, but of their friend as well.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, my late colleague, Hon. GEORGE W. SMITH, who passed away at his home in Murphysboro, Ill., in the first days of the present session of this Congress, preceded me as a member of this body by three Congresses, being first elected in 1888 to the Fifty-first Congress, making ten successive Congresses to which he had been elected from southern Illinois.

I knew him well and met him almost daily during the last twelve years when this House was in session. Among the 391 Representatives here there remain but 6 who equal or exceed in terms of service that of my lamented colleague. They are Speaker CANNON, from my own State, with seventeen terms; Representative BINGHAM of Pennsylvania, fifteen terms; Representative PAYNE of New York, twelve terms; Representative DALZELL of Pennsylvania, eleven terms; Representative HEPBURN of Iowa, eleven terms, and Representative SHERMAN of New York, ten terms. For a period of twenty years he survived the mutations of politics, the rivalries of political associates, factional strife, the unavoidable disappointment of followers, as well as the attacks of the opposing party. All this is necessarily involved in such a long and uninterrupted legislative career.

The Representative in Congress is the only national official chosen directly by the people. His constituency is not too large to come in personal contact with him and to form an independent individual estimate of his character and ability. His brief term of two years brings him back quickly to learn the people's latest mandate, their opinions, the objects of their present thought, their problems and their difficulties. Custom has added to his legislative duties that of being the people's agent with reference to their individual matters with the Government, thus bringing him into daily contact with them in even their private affairs.

Mr. SMITH had passed the stage of accidental preferment. He had withstood the eliminating and inexorable test of time, with all the trials common to such an experience. That he surmounted these difficulties through the years is of deep significance when we remember that this affirmative answer comes from an intelligent constituency of almost 200,000 people.

For eighteen years prior to his first election to Congress the people of his section knew Mr. SMITH as a lawyer at Murphysboro, and had nominated and elected him in 1880 as a Republican Presidential elector. They knew him intimately and well and had the very best opportunity to measure the elements of his character and ability. Therefore their unwavering loyalty to him through a fifth of a century is a higher tribute to his character and noble qualities of mind and heart than the most eloquent panegyric that could be uttered here by his friends and colleagues.

Mr. SMITH served at various times during his service here upon the following committees: Claims, War Claims, Militia, the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and Insular Affairs, and was for many years the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims. He devoted himself very industriously to the work upon his committees, where, as we all know, the most of the real work of this House is done. Being for many years on the subcommittee of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, which framed the post-office appropriation bills, he had to do with the appropriation made for the trial of rural free delivery, and he took a just pride in being one of the earliest supporters of this service while it was yet in its experimental stage. He was also an earnest advocate of penny postage, and first introduced a bill for that purpose in 1892 and continued to introduce the same measure each Congress until his death, presenting from time to time numerous petitions from over the country in behalf of that movement. While on this committee he visited Australia and contributed on his return to the bringing about of the parcels-post convention between the United States and Australia.

While upon the Committee on Insular Affairs, his last important committee, he felt it his duty to make a trip to the Philippines and Porto Rico that he might be better equipped for his duties in that behalf.

Mr. SMITH also visited Cuba, the Isthmus of Panama since our operations in the construction of the canal, Alaska, and almost every part of the mainland of the United States. He also broadened his observations of the world by a trip to Europe, and endeavored to prepare himself as best he could for the work which devolved upon him as a Representative of the people. Upon his election to Congress he gave up the practice of his profession of the law and devoted himself entirely to his official duties. He secured three appropriations at different times for the national cemetery at Mound City, in his district, and through his efforts had allotted from time to time, out of the general appropriation for the Mississippi River, an aggregate of at least a half million dollars for the carrying out of projects along that portion of the river within the boundaries of his district, where they were properly needed.

He was an earnest advocate of the popular primary system, and was three times nominated by a primary called by the Congressional committee of his district before any primary law had been passed by the State of Illinois. Mr. SMITH was only 15 years old when the civil war began; nevertheless he offered himself as a volunteer soldier before that contest closed, but was rejected because of his then physical condition. He took great interest in the Federal soldiers and their widows when their claims were pending in the Pension Bureau or before Congress in the shape of legislation, and in his district I am sure that they will remember his helpfulness for many a year yet to come.

He loved his country and was proud of its history and confident of its glorious and successful future. Our colleague was a warm-hearted, loyal, manly man, and had no associate on the Illinois delegation who was not his friend and wellwisher. Rancor, jealousy, meanness seemed to have no place in his soul. He speedily forgot a slight or injury, but ever remembered a friendly obligation. His honesty and sincerity were both unquestioned. His home life was congenial and delightful; but whether at home or elsewhere, his kindly spirit was always manifest, leaving in companionship never an impression that rankled, never a cut that hurt. At home this broad and generous bearing must have disarmed and conquered many an enmity and won many a fast friend and adherent. The people adhered to him and were drawn by him. Were they mistaken? I am sure they were not, for they knew him and correctly interpreted his character and life.

This modest colleague has passed away. He was not given to heralding his own accomplishments, either here or at home; much less was he accustomed to enlarging upon them. But now that he has gone, it has seemed to me that he would prefer a truthful narration of his faithful work and efforts for his home community and his nation to stilted phrase and fulsome laudation.

In the midst of the activity of his career he immediately stepped from this life into the beyond. While we regret his departure, yet, for the consolation of his faithful wife and friends, was he not fortunate in not being compelled to linger just outside the portals, through protracted and weary months of pain and helplessness, a prisoner to disease, craving death to free him? God only knows, but since Providence had determined that his earthly work had ceased and the time of his departure was at hand, I prefer to believe that an infinite and divine love summoned his spirit thence without a probationary period of pain.

[Mr. PRINCE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay my tribute of respect and esteem to and of affection for my late colleague, GEORGE W. SMITH. If these services were to be held in his home district in Illinois, there would be no building large enough to accommodate his friends who would desire to be present. A man is best known at home. I am not one of those who believe that the prophet is not without honor save in his own land. At his own home and among his own neighbors he is best known. There, if he is worthy, he is appreciated at his full worth, and there GEORGE W. SMITH was best known and most appreciated. For the people of his district he labored in season and out of season. He loved his home and appreciated his home people, and his strength and his political prestige were based on the fact that he was always for his home people and for their interests. No Congressman who ever held a seat on this floor was more faithful to, or more diligent in looking after the wants and the interests of the people of his district than GEORGE W. SMITH.

Green be the turf above thee,
Friend of my better days;
None knew thee but to love thee,
None named thee but to praise.

The people of his district will miss him, and as the years go by will know that in him they have lost a true and devoted friend. Of him they will say:

While memory bids me weep thee,
Nor thoughts nor words are free,
The grief is fixed too deeply
That mourns a man like thee.

I have been profoundly impressed with the great number of our colleagues here who have been called from life during our term of service. We are reminded, oh, so often, that neither great nor small can avoid the call of the grim monster, Death. Our fathers met him and were vanquished. We shall each in our turn meet him and pass on; to a better or worse condition, we know not. We must all cross the deep, dark river; how soon, we know not. What is on the other side we do not know. We can only hope that life is eternal and that over there somewhere we shall meet the friends gone before us.

The thoughts we are thinking our fathers did think;
From the death we are shrinking our fathers did shrink;
To the life we are clinging our fathers did cling,
But it speeds from us all like the bird on the wing.

We bid our friend farewell. We shall see him no more.

We pass; the path that each man trod
Is dim, or will be dim, with weeds;
What fame is left for human deeds
In endless age? It rests with God.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Speaker—

I have seen man in the pride of his strength. He walked, he leaped, he ran, he rejoiced in that he was more excellent than the rose. Again I saw him, and behold, life had departed from him and the breath from out of his nostrils.

We all realize the fact that death is in the world, but what a gracious thing it is to know that men are remembered for what they have done. In the last week or two in this House we have supposed that there is not room enough on the earth for all of us, if we were to accept the appearances, but when there comes a time to us all, which must come to everyone, whatever may be our political belief and whatever may have been our political contests, whatever may be the religious belief which we hold, we, after all, come together, American citizens, bone of one bone and flesh of one flesh, recognizing the eternal mandate that, after all, we are brethren, that we are our brother's keeper, and that we appreciate each other.

Times have changed very greatly in the years in which we have had our experiences. We live in a day of enlightened religion. Hell is not as large as it used to be. Seventy-five years or so ago it was decidedly the largest section of the universe. Everybody went there except our own set. Now very few are going. The soldiers of truth have come home from the wars covered o'er with the smoke and dust of battle, but they are marching beneath arches of flowers erected by loving and sympathetic hands. I have an abiding faith in the immortality of the soul. I believe that this earth is only the nursery from which there is to be transplanted the trees which are to blossom and bear their fruit in another world. I believe, therefore, that the work that we may do here is worthy of appreciation by everyone, and that each one as he passes hence is entitled to that respectful consideration and that grateful word of remembrance to which all men, honored for the work they have done here, are entitled. I believe that when a life, balanced by death, shows a credit of good deeds done against life's mistakes and faults, that will receive the plaudit "Well done." Indiana and Illinois are very closely related in a business way as well as by geographical boundaries.

The citizens of Illinois are very closely related to those of Indiana. Indiana is able to appreciate the greatness of that great State. Indiana had a hand in the education of GEORGE W. SMITH. He graduated in the law department of the Indiana University. Above all, however, he was an American citizen who believed in his country, believed in his fellow-men. He served his people well at home and he served his people well here. It is a splendid thing, indeed, to know that those who are most intimately acquainted with him, who associated with him almost daily through his life, can speak the words of praise that they do, and speak them with a heartfelt appreciation of what he was. I was one of the committee which went out to his funeral, and my heart was filled with gratitude indeed to see that large assemblage of people in his home city, to see them tenderly cover his coffin with flowers, and as tenderly go out to the city of the dead.

He was our fellow-citizen, he was an Illinoisan, but he was an American. State lines do not encompass the privileges of men in the United States. I glory in the fact that in this land of liberty one man is only better than another if he behaves himself better. I am glad to know that that was the guiding star of GEORGE W. SMITH. He appreciated his opportunities, he embraced his responsibilities, he acted up to the dignity of American civilization, and went out to eternity to meet his God, having served his country well. It is not for us to judge faults of men, for if the faults of human kind were all unpardonable sins there would be no hereafter of promise, but on this resurrection day, under this beautiful sky with this bright sun, we can appreciate that it is not only an appropriate day to pronounce a eulogy on a well-spent life, but it is also an appropriate day to look forward to that immortality which is given to all those who remember the Creator of the Universe.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, GEORGE W. SMITH served long and creditably in this House. His people commissioned him for still longer service. Death and not his constituents terminated his career. He retained the confidence of his people to the end. They knew him well, and he could not so long and so firmly hold their respect and esteem except upon merit. Their steadfast support is strongest evidence of his worth.

Life has its own unobtrusive reciprocity. The people sustained Representative SMITH, and Representative SMITH strove manfully to serve them, not only officially, but also personally. He never tired of the labor of love—and such it surely was in his case—performed throughout his entire career, in doing for his constituents collectively and for thousands of them individually whatever their wants suggested and his ability with his opportunities could accomplish.

His admiration for and pride in the people who honored him and whom he served was very great. His people were ever uppermost in his mind. He was a diligent and faithful representative of a great constituency, and those whom he served stood manfully between him and political danger.

Faithfulness to the people who put us in high places surely is admirable, and thus faithful was our friend. The Congressman who serves well his immediate constituency almost always serves his country well. On the other hand, the Member who serves special interests is a bad representative of any American constituency, as well as a bad lawmaker for the Republic. A special interest is none the less a special interest because located in one's own district, and its servant in the Congress of our country is none the less an enemy of good government because his home and the home of his master are in the same city or county. To the honor of GEORGE W. SMITH it can be truthfully said that the people—the many and not the few—appealed to his sense of justice and of gratitude, and to them his services were gladly given.

It is no secret among the friends of Mr. SMITH that he was not entirely satisfied with his treatment in late years in the make-up of committees. But if he was proud and felt keenly the sting of what he esteemed a wrong suffered in the household of political friends, he was also sensitive, and pride and sensitiveness combined to make him silent.

He was a good friend and a manly antagonist. He was every man's friend, and the enemy of no one. He was too kindly in disposition and too broad to harbor hatred or ill will. He was a true man. So let his faults rest in the grave with his body, while we cherish the memory of his many good traits and good deeds.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, we have met to-day to pay fitting tribute to the character and public services of a distinguished Member of this House and a faithful servant to the people. I first met Mr. SMITH at the beginning of the Fifty-eighth Congress, where we happened to be both assigned to the same committee, the Committee on the Militia. Soon after a vacancy occurred in the chairmanship, and Mr. SMITH, who ranked me, very promptly sent word that, having another chairmanship, he did not desire the place, but advised me to assert my claim as the next one in order. Being a new Member I did not get the place at that time, but I always felt grateful to Mr. SMITH for his kindness and consideration in the matter. When Congress adjourned for the holidays in December, 1906, we both joined a party of Congressmen for a trip to Panama, and on this delightful trip of three weeks we were together a great deal, both on shipboard and ashore, and I found him a most delightful companion. He had been reared on the frontier and seen his own immediate neighborhood advance from a wilderness to one of the richest and most prosperous agricultural sections of the whole country. He knew the hardships and sacrifices of pioneer life and his sympathy with the people was natural and genuine. He was not only a well-read man generally, but had traveled extensively in his own country as well as nearly every country on the globe. He was a close observer and an independent and original thinker. He had studied social and political questions abroad, and no doubt to this fact was largely due his constant interest in the extension and betterment of the mail service in our own country. To hear him tell of his travels and observations was not only a continuous source of information, but a delight.

Of him it might be truly said:

> He foreign countries knew; but they were known
> Not for themselves, but to advance his own.

Mr. SMITH was first elected to Congress in 1888, and was successively reelected nine times. He served in the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses on the Committees on Territories and Claims, and in the Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Congresses he was chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims. His most important service, however, was on the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, of which he was an active and influential member for ten years, from 1893 to 1903. He was one of the originators of the rural free-delivery service, in which fact he always took a just pride. His last speech on the floor of the House, February 19, 1907, was devoted to this subject, and he reviewed the origin and growth of the rural free-delivery service from the beginning and its beneficent influence upon the people.

The State of Illinois has in the past furnished more than its share of great names to illuminate the pages of our country's history. Illinois is still furnishing at least her share of the illustrious statesmen who are now in the present guiding our Ship of State, and in such a galaxy it is difficult to shine; but though the services of these may be more conspicuous they could not excel in high conception of honor and fidelity to duty the more humble career of our departed and honored friend.

> Honor and shame from no condition rise;
> Act well your part, there all the honor lies.

That the people whom he had so long and faithfully served appreciated him and loved him was most pathetically shown by the large outpouring of the people and universal evidences of grief on the occasion of his funeral at his old home.

He died in the fullness of his prime, and in his death the people lost a faithful friend and wise legislator. He has gone to—

> The undiscovered country, from whose bourn
> No traveler returns—

And whose secrets we may not know, except by faith in love divine; but this we know, that earth has received into its final embrace few men more beloved than was GEORGE W. SMITH.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This closes the exercises, and, in accordance with the resolution previously adopted, I now declare the House adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

He also presented sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 6379) grant an increase of pension to Abraham W. Howard, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 1710) granting a pension to Laura A. Swiger, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DANIEL presented a petition of the Board of Trade and Business Men's Association of Norfolk, Va., praying that an appropriation be made for the erection of a monument at Richmond, Va., to the memory of John Tyler, ex-President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. FRAZIER presented an affidavit to accompany the bill (S. 2370) for the relief of the estate of Henry Sessler, of Knox County, Tenn., which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GAMBLE presented the petitions of R. E. Harter, C. E. Rubendale, F. Lauritsen, C. J. Christensen, Alfred Jensen, Louis Nelson, Fred Nelson, L. Elder, Conrad Reesburg, Peter J. Rogress, Geo. W. Bowen, and W. A. Bapp, all citizens of South Dakota, praying for the enactment of legislation to protect the first day of the week as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOPKINS presented memorials of sundry national banks of Peoria and Pekin, in the State of Illinois, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "Aldrich currency bill," which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the city council of Chicago, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the giving to or receipt by public officers of any free frank or privilege for the transmission of messages by telegraph or telephone and to prevent discriminations in interstate telegraph and telephone rates, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions of sundry labor organizations of Belleville and Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the so-called "Sherman antitrust law" relating to labor organizations, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL PUBLICITY BILL.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I present a petition of the National Publicity Bill Organization. In presenting it, it is not inappropriate to say that this organization is absolutely nonpartisan and that the demand for the legislation proposed comes from the entire country and from the general public.

The underlying purpose of this movement for the publication of contributions made for campaign purposes is to limit the expenditures in political contests to legitimate purposes and to lessen the use of money in political elections.

No complaint, Mr. President, is made of nonaction on the part of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections so far as this petition is concerned. I invite the attention of the chairman of that committee, however, and of the Senate, to the fact that bills have been pending for many months on this subject before that committee. On the 10th of December, 1907, I introduced a bill on the subject, and it was referred to that committee. On February 28, 1908, a bill was introduced by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], much more elaborate in form, upon the same subject. I would refer, if it were proper to do so, to measures of this character introduced in another body; and my sole purpose in calling attention to it now is to suggest the general nonpartisan interest of the country in legislation of this character.

I present the petition and ask particularly, as I understand under the rule it is necessary to do so, that the signatures attached to the petition may be printed in the RECORD, with the petition itself, as well as the accompanying papers, which consist of letters written by prominent men of different political parties throughout the country. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD as it appears in the manuscript which I send to the desk, and that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

There being no objection, the petition and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

THE PETITION OF THE NATIONAL PUBLICITY BILL ORGANIZATION.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The National Publicity Bill Organization respectfully asks the Congress to enact at the present session a suitable law for the publicity both before and after election of campaign contributions made to national committees to be used in influencing the approaching election of November 3, 1908.

The organization is constrained to make this appeal at this time without urging Congressional legislation requiring publicity of contributions made to State committees or other committees operating only in one State. The association has limited the scope of its efforts to securing publicity of contributions made to national committees and Congressional committees formed to influence in more than one State elections where Members of the National House of Representatives are to be chosen; and to promote by all appropriate means State legislation designed to accomplish in every State the same purpose of publicity.

It is thought that the wisest method of preventing election corruption through money contributions will be not through national laws alone nor through State laws alone, but through both methods; each cooperating and not conflicting with the other and both making the best and most effective system.

This would secure harmonious cooperation of both the national and State legislatures, and avoid any discussion of troublesome constitutional questions. There can not be any doubt of the power of Congress to do what we propose, nor any doubt about the power of the States to provide the additional regulations desired. An act of Congress carefully framed might prove to be a model law for the States to follow.

Moreover it seems to this organization that at this late day in the present session it will be impossible to accomplish the passage by Congress of anything more than a publicity law applicable to national committees and Congressional committees operating in more than one State. The differences in the last Congress between those who sought to do this and those who sought to do more proved fatal to any legislation whatever. It is to aid in preventing another such fatality that the association makes its present earnest appeal.

The National Publicity Bill Organization is nonpartisan and hopes that the efforts to secure the beneficial laws so much needed will not become involved in the controversies of political parties. But it is impossible to overlook the fact that the present minority party will impose upon the majority party the weighty responsibility for the failure of any legislation, if such failure shall ensue. To avoid such a deplorable political issue, should not the members of both parties unite in postponing all propositions on which there may be a sincere division of sentiment and in passing through Congress without further delay a bill upon which all cordially agree?

Accompanying this petition are letters from members of the Publicity Organization showing that their views are in accord with those herein presented.

THE NATIONAL PUBLICITY BILL ORGANIZATION,
By PERRY BELMONT,
JOHN M. THURSTON,
WM. E. CHANDLER,
JOHN E. LAMB,
CRAMMOND KENNEDY,
Acting for the Committee on Legislation.

APRIL 9, 1908.

Hon. PERRY BELMONT.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 4th to hand. I regret exceedingly that I can not be present at the meeting of the National Publicity Law Organization on April 16. I certainly concur in the opinion that we should advocate the enactment of a national law for publicity of contributions made to National and Congressional committees. If we attempt to interfere with the States, we will get into serious trouble. I may be influenced in my opinion by the fact that we have a law in this State that requires publicity in regard to all contributions in political campaigns.

Regretting that I can not be with you and wishing you great success in the movement you have so ably and earnestly carried on, I have the honor to be,

Very respectfully, yours, HENRY T. KENT.

INTERNATIONAL TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION,
Indianapolis, Ind., April 9, 1908.

Mr. PERRY BELMONT.

DEAR SIR: Replying to the communication of April 4, signed by Mr. Perry Belmont and Mr. W. E. Chandler, I have to say that in my opinion the National Publicity Law Organization should advocate only the enactment of a law for the publicity of contributions made to the National and Congressional committees of the political parties, leaving legislation concerning contributions to State and other local committees to be dealt with by State laws.

If the nation will set the example, the States will follow.

Sincerely, JAMES M. LYNCH.

Hons. PERRY BELMONT and W. E. CHANDLER.

GENTLEMEN: In compliance with your request, permit me to say that my present impression is that we want to make a start. The direction of the step we take is of infinitely more importance than the length of it, and I cordially agree with you that we "should advocate only the enactment of a law for the publicity of contributions made to the National and Congressional committees of the political parties" at this time.

In this country the great governing power is public opinion, and to have an intelligent public opinion requires a public knowledge of the facts. Take this step first, and the public will, in course of time, demand all of the facts needed.

Very respectfully, yours, JAMES K. JONES.

NEW YORKER STAATS-ZEITUNG,
New York City, April 9, 1908.

Hon. PERRY BELMONT.

MY DEAR MR. BELMONT: In reply to your favor of the 4th instant in relation to legislation for the publicity of campaign contributions, I beg to state that I am impressed with the necessity of giving such legislation the broadest possible scope, covering contributions made not only to National and Congressional committees of the political parties, but to State and local committees also.

Should Congress deem it advisable to limit its action to the first-named class of contributions, no effort should be spared to induce the legislators of the several States to supplement Congressional legislation by the enactment of adequate State laws.

Yours, faithfully, HERMAN RIDDER.

NEW YORK, April 9, 1908.

Hon. PERRY BELMONT and Hon. W. E. CHANDLER.

DEAR SIRS: Answering the inquiry contained in your letter of April 4, I would say that I heartily concur in your opinion that at present you should advocate only the enactment of a law for the publicity of contributions made to National and Congressional committees of the political parties, leaving legislation concerning contributions to State and other local committees to be dealt with by State laws.

I am, your obedient servant, FRANCIS LYNDE STETSON.

Here is another letter:

NEW YORK CITY, April 9, 1908.

Messrs. PERRY BELMONT and WILLIAM E. CHANDLER.

GENTLEMEN: Acknowledging receipt of the favor communicated to me, bearing date April 4, 1908, in which you ask to receive a statement of my present impression as to the legislation which you should urge the committee of Congress to report and recommend for passage, I beg to say that I coincide entirely with the opinion contained in your circular of that date, that the organization should advocate only the enactment of a law for publicity of contributions made to National and Congressional committees of the political parties.

Very truly, yours, EDWARD LAUTERBACH.

IOWA CITY, IOWA, April 9, 1908.

Hon. PERRY BELMONT and Hon. WILLIAM E. CHANDLER.

GENTLEMEN: I am in receipt of your circular of April 4, asking as to my views concerning legislation to be sought in Congress concerning publicity of election expenses. I note with great respect the suggestion that we should limit our attempts to seeking the passage of a law to make public contributions to National and Congressional committees of the political parties. Having heard the debates more or less in the House of Commons when the present law was passed in England and having spoken and printed more or less in this country, I must express my strong conviction that a very carefully drawn and comprehensive law is necessary and that anything less than this is of little, if any, avail except as it may be possibly the forerunner of a more complete and drastic law. If an opening is left for fraud or secrecy we may be sure that the very competent persons seeking to gain by such means will avail themselves of this opening.

The original Wisconsin law, which I drew, was so modified in its passage that it did not compel proper reports from political committees. Candidates, therefore, simply subscribed any sum they desired expended and turned it over to a committee. They reported this fact, but there was no means of ascertaining what the committee did with the money.

If you build a fence which is to keep out noxious animals, it will be unavailing if there is a hole in it. I am very strongly of the opinion that the law should limit the amount which may be spent by a candidate or by the organization backing him in the canvass for an office. Within a day or so I have heard of the judge of a supreme court who has been defeated for reelection, and it is said that he spent $6,000 and that the successful candidate spent $15,000. Political campaigns ought not to be contests in buying, and our national law ought to stringently limit the expenses in a national election and to compel every cent to be accounted for as effectively as the English law or as the California law or Missouri law in this country.

I write promptly on the receipt of your circular. I realize fully the difficulty of shaping a law and carrying it containing provisions of the nature indicated. I shall be grateful for your efforts in carrying any measure, but my observation and investigation convince me that only the most comprehensive, thorough, and far-sighted statute can operate to exclude financial fraud and corrupting influences from our elections. Many of the State statutes are so defective that they are a mere cover for fraud. When I offered a draft of a law in Wisconsin, I found the principal opposition was to its being made thorough.

I beg to express my very warm appreciation of your efforts in this course and my earnest hope that they may be successful.

Very sincerely, yours, CHARLES NOBLE GREGORY.

JEFFERSON CITY, MO., April 9, 1908.

Hon. PERRY BELMONT.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your circular letter of April 4, I beg to say that I heartily approve the efforts of your committee to induce Congress to pass a law compelling publicity of campaign contributions; and, knowing from experience how difficult it is to get any effective legislation through Congress regulating such matters as this, I think you will do well if you succeed in getting legislation requiring publicity of contributions for National and Congressional campaigns; leaving all other matters to be acted upon in the future or by the separate States.

I wish most heartily to commend the work which your committee is doing and to express most earnestly the hope that it may succeed in getting something done.

Regretting that I will not be able to attend the meeting of the committee on April 16, I assure you of my earnest desire to favor the movement in any way that I can.

Very truly, yours, W. D. VANDIVER.

BOWDOIN COLLEGE,
Brunswick, Me., April 9, 1908.

Mr. PERRY BELMONT, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BELMONT: In reply to your inquiry, I beg to say that in my opinion it would be wisest to confine the proposed legislation to contributions made to the National and Congressional committees of the political parties.

Very truly, yours, WM. D. W. HYDE.

ANTIOCH COLLEGE,
Yellow Springs, Ohio, April 10, 1908.

Hon. PERRY BELMONT.

DEAR SIR: I am heartily in favor of the plan of centralizing the effort of your committee upon the effort to get Congressional legislation upon publicity of contributions in any way connected with national elections, directly or indirectly. If too many things are attempted at once we may lose everything. But if we can secure the enactment of such a law for national elections, and its benefits clearly shown by the actual results of a few elections, the influence will go a good ways in the way of securing State legislation to the same end. I sincerely hope that your committee may be successful in getting Congress to enact such a law.

Very truly, yours, STEPHEN F. WESTON.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Baton Rouge, April 10, 1908.

Hon. PERRY BELMONT.

DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 4th instant, apprising me that there will be a meeting of the committee on legislation of the National Publicity Law Organization on Thursday, April 16.

I regret to say that my public duties will not permit my being in Washington at that time.

My administration as governor is drawing to a close and I have much to do before I give way to my successor on May 18.

With us, in Louisiana, it is four years in the governor's office and out. The constitution prohibits a second consecutive term.

Relative to the work of the organization, I am of the opinion that we should advocate only the enactment of a law for the publicity of contributions made to the National and Congressional committees of the political parties, leaving legislation concerning contributions to State and other local committees to be dealt with by State laws.

Yours, very truly,

N. C. BLANCHARD.

ALBANY, April 1, 1908.

DEAR SIRS: Replying to your favor of the 4th instant, it seems to me more expedient that your committee should advocate the enactment of a law applicable to the National and Congressional committees of the political parties.

Very truly, yours, WM. J. WALLACE.

Hon. PERRY BELMONT and Hon. WM. E. CHANDLER.

LEBANON, ILL., April 11, 1908.

Hon. PERRY BELMONT.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of the 4th instant, I have to say that I am in entire accord with your view that, for the present, the National Publicity Law Organization should confine its efforts to secure an "enactment of a law for the publicity of contributions made to the National and Congressional committees of the political parties."

While I think additional requirements might be properly made, I am clear that the undertaking too much in that direction might prove fatal to a more conservative method of legislation.

Very respectfully,

M. H. CHAMBERLIN.

STAMFORD, CONN., April 11, 1908.

Hon. PERRY BELMONT.

MY DEAR SIR: In answer to your communication of April 4, I would say that I am in accord with the proposition set forth in the third paragraph of your letter and doubt if it is advisable to pursue the matter further at this time.

Very truly, yours, HOMER S. CUMMINGS.

KANSAS CITY, April 11, 1908.

MY DEAR SIR: I quite agree with you on the advisability of urging the passage of a bill of limited scope for the publicity of election expenditures. Such a measure would mark a distinct forward step and could be supplemented later by any legislation found necessary.

I am inclosing an editorial on the subject from the Star of April 11.

Very truly,

W. R. NELSON.

Mr. PERRY BELMONT.

CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

For some years there has been earnest agitation of the question of enforcing the publicity of all campaign contributions relating to national elections. A strong public sentiment has been created in favor of this important regulation. In obedience to this sentiment, a bill is now pending in Congress providing for the desired publicity. The question is whether the bill will be passed, defeated, or smothered.

No party should be afraid to go before the country with a record of its campaign financiering. No candidate for office should hesitate to have the people know the sources of campaign money. In other words, such contributions should come only from legitimate sources, and only money from such sources would be accepted if the facts had to be made public. Hence the great importance of publicity. The people do not want successful candidates to owe their election to special interests affected by the subsequent administrations of such candidates. Such favors and the obligations they involve are absolutely against the principles of honest government, whether that government be national, State, or municipal.

PHILADELPHIA, April 13, 1908.

GENTLEMEN: I think you are right in your conclusion that it would be better to have the committee advocate only "the enactment of a law for the publicity of contributions made to the National and Congressional committees of the political parties, leaving legislation concerning contributions to State and other local committees to be dealt with by State laws."

While I was governor of this Commonwealth I succeeded in having a law passed which requires publicity for such expenses. I am informed that practically it is a success, and that the campaign expenses of candidates have besides been very much reduced.

Very truly, yours,

SAM'L W. PENNYPACKER.

Messrs. PERRY BELMONT and W. E. CHANDLER.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., April 15, 1908.

Hon. PERRY BELMONT.

MY DEAR MR. BELMONT: I believe that it would be well for the present to ask for a law confining its provisions to National and Congressional committees, leaving State and local committees to be dealt with by State laws; but I want it understood that I favor the fullest publicity of all contributions. The election of United States Senators by the people and the publicity of campaign contributions before election will go far to remedy many of the abuses that the people complain of.

With assurances of my high personal regard and regretting that I can not be with you, believe me,

Truly, yours, ALEX. TROUP.

[From the minutes of the meeting of the Democratic National Committee at Washington, D. C., December 12, 1907.]

Resolved, That the Democratic National Committee approves the movement now under way to insure the publicity in the States, as well as in the nation, of all contributions of money or other things of value to and of expenditures made by any person, association, committee, or other organization for political purposes.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I report back from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 19158) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and I submit a report (No. 544) thereon.

I will state in this connection that the bill came from the House to the Senate carrying $11,508,806. We report it from committee carrying $11,642,146, an increase of only $133,340.

I wish to give notice that I desire to take up the bill at the earliest opportunity. I hope there may be time toward the end of the present legislative day for at least the reading of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like the bill to be printed a sufficient length of time before it is taken up that I may investigate some items in it.

Mr. WARREN. There will be no undue haste about it, and if taken up there will be a printed report and a printed bill lying on all the Senators' desks. If there is any objection made to such early consideration, of course I will not press it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT EASTON, PA.

Mr. CLAY. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 1930) to provide for the erection of a public building at Easton, Pa., and I submit a report (No. 545) thereon.

This is a bill introduced by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. He has been detained at his home on account of sickness, and I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 12, after the words "one hundred," to strike out the words "and fifty;" and after the word "dollars," in line 13, to strike out the words "which is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected on the site purchased pursuant to the act of June 30, 1906, a suitable building, with fireproof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices at the city of Easton, in the county of Northampton and State of Pennsylvania. The plans and specifications and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the building complete the sum of $100,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after the word "alleys," to insert a period and to strike out the remainder of the bill in the following words:

And that no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Pennsylvania shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of the said State and the service of civil process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CULLOM submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $15,000 to defray the cost of mining and transporting coal in and from Alaska for a steaming test by a vessel of the United States Navy to determine the value of the coal to the Navy, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT submitted an amendment providing that civilian professors at the Naval Academy shall receive annually during the first five years of service $2,200, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,606.08 for one superintendent of teams, or quarterman, at the navy-yard, New York, N. Y., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted an amendment providing that no pension or portion thereof shall be withheld or retained for the purpose of establishing any fund or assisting in the expenses of any Soldiers' Home, State or national, etc., without the consent of the pensioner, intended to be proposed by him to the pension appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed.

HEARING BEFORE COMMITTEE ON WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, it was Ordered, That 10,000 additional copies of the hearing of the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage March 3, 1908, be ordered printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. M. C. LATTA, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on March 23, 1908, approved and signed the following joint resolution:

S. R. 69. Joint resolution granting authority for the use of certain balances of appropriations for the Light-House Establishment to be available for certain named purposes.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 20345. An act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PENSIONING OF TEXAS VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has very kindly yielded to me to ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 5581) pensioning the surviving officers and enlisted men of the Texas volunteers employed in the defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations from 1855 to 1860, inclusive, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions, limitations, and benefits of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Creek war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war," approved July 27, 1892, be, and the same are hereby, extended from the date of the passage of this act to the surviving officers and enlisted men of the Texas volunteers who served in the defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations from the year 1855 to the year 1860, inclusive; and also to include the surviving widows of such of said officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried: Provided further, That where there is no record of enlistment or muster into the service of the United States in the service mentioned in this act the fact of reimbursement to Texas by the United States, as evidence by the muster rolls and vouchers on file in the War Department, shall be accepted as full and satisfactory proof of such enlistment and service: And provided further, That all contracts heretofore made between the beneficiaries under this act and pension attorneys and claim agents are hereby declared null and void.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURROWS. I should like to inquire from what committee the bill was reported?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was reported from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURROWS. The chairman of that committee is not present.

Mr. CULBERSON. Of course, if there is to be discussion about this matter, I will not insist upon considering it now, in view of the notice given by the Senator from Idaho. But I will state to the Senator from Michigan, and probably his objection will be removed, that this is the unanimous report of the Committee on Pensions, and I think an identical bill has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Pensions of another body.

Mr. BURROWS. I make no objection, then.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KEAN. Let the report be published in the RECORD with the bill, showing the number of people who are pensionable under it, and so on.

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly; I have no objection.

There being no objection, the report submitted by Mr. SCOTT April 9, 1908, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5581) pensioning the surviving officers and enlisted men of the Texas volunteers employed in the defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations from 1855 to 1860, inclusive, and for other purposes, have examined the same and beg to report as follows:

An exactly similar bill (H. R. 1) has been favorably reported by the Committee on Pensions of the House of Representatives and is now on the House Calendar. The report submitted by that committee is hereby adopted and the passage of the bill is recommended.

The House report is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1) pensioning the surviving officers and enlisted men of the Texas volunteers, etc., have considered the same and respectfully report as follows:

"A similar bill (H. R. 25892) was before your committee in the Fifty-ninth Congress, but was not reported to the House owing to lack of time for its consideration.

"A small number of men are surviving who volunteered for the protection of the frontiers of the State of Texas against marauding Mexicans and Indians between the years 1855 and 1860, and who are not beneficiaries of the acts of Congress passed in grateful recognition of the valorous deeds of the pioneer defenders of the nation. They are now, nearly fifty years after the close of their service, of advanced age and consequent infirmity, if not entirely disabled, and, as a rule, in pecuniary need. It is probable that when the act of July 27, 1892, was passed its provisions were expected to extend to all those who took part in the early Indian wars, but the class named in the bill were not provided for because the period of their service was subsequent to that named in the act to bestow title to pension, though by later legislation (act of June 27, 1902) similar service rendered in other Indian wars and disturbances, as late as the year 1858, was recognized:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE MILITARY SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 20, 1907.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 16th instant, relative to a resolution (H. J. Res. 210, 59th Cong., 2d sess.) extending the benefits of existing Indian war pension laws to certain surviving officers and enlisted men (and their widows) who rendered military service for thirty days or more in defense of the frontiers of the State of Texas against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations between February 28, 1855, and June 21, 1860, in which letter you request information as to whether the War Department holds that a "state of recognized warfare existed during the period and in the locality named," and if so, whether the proposed beneficiaries under the resolution were actual participants in the same, I beg leave to advise you as follows:

Nothing has been found of record to show whether a "state of recognized warfare" existed in Texas between February 28, 1855, and June 21, 1860. In this connection it is proper to remark, however, that in considering the proviso to the sixth section of the Army appropriation act approved June 21, 1860, which section provided for "payment of volunteers called out in defense of the frontier of that State since the 28th day of February, 1855," the Secretary of War decided that "there was a necessity for calling out the Texas volunteers mentioned therein, and that they were called out by competent authority." That decision was made November 15, 1860, and is printed as "No. 118" on page 133 of House Executive Document No. 277, Forty-second Congress, second session.

It is impracticable to ascertain from the records of the War Department whether the proposed beneficiaries under the resolution in question were actual participants in the operations in defense of the State of Texas against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations.

Under date of April 30, 1872, the Secretary of War, in accordance with a request of the subcommittee on appropriations, transmitted to the House of Representatives a report of Lieut. Thomas H. Bradley, Twenty-first Infantry, concerning the history and character of certain claims of the State of Texas. That report is printed as Executive Document No. 277, House of Representatives, Forty-second Congress, second session, and contains—

(1) A résumé of "the condition of affairs that may have rendered it necessary from time to time to employ Texan rangers or volunteers within that State" at various dates between November 1, 1854, and some time in September, 1860, for the purpose of suppressing Indian hostilities on the frontier; and

(2) An exhibit of the character of the troops, the circumstances under which employed, and, as far as ascertained, a history of their services.

A history of the disturbances and military operations in Texas during the period in question, so far as ascertainable from the records of the War Department, can be obtained from the document before referred to.

The letter of January 11, 1907, to Hon. A. S. BURLESON, House of Representatives, inclosed with your communication, is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,
F. C. AINSWORTH,
The Military Secretary.

Hon. H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
Chairman Committee on Pensions, House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 31, 1907.

SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of yesterday, received this morning, for an estimate of the probable number of beneficiaries under the bill (H. R. 1, 60th Cong., 1st sess.) "pensioning the surviving officers and enlisted men of the Texas volunteers employed in the defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations from 1855 to 1860, inclusive, and for other purposes," who will survive on March 1, 1908, I beg leave to advise you as follows:

The rolls and other records on file in the War Department of troops in the service of the State of Texas between February 28, 1855, and June 21, 1860, in defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations, account for 1,301 officers and enlisted men. That number does not include 174 officers and men who were in the military service of the United States and who are probably pensionable under existing law.

The 1,301 officers and enlisted men before referred to may include some few duplications due to the service of the same man in different organizations at different times, but whether it does, and if so how many, can not be determined from the records. The number of such duplications, however, can not be very large, and to disregard it will probably not materially affect an estimate of the number of survivors at this remote date.

Assuming that the 1,301 officers and enlisted men were from 21 to 25 years of age at the date of their service and having in mind the probability that many of those men were in the military service (either Union or Confederate) during the civil war, and consequently were exposed to a higher rate of mortality during that period, it is estimated that on March 1, 1908, there will be surviving about 390 of those officers and men.

This office has no data upon which any estimate of the number of the surviving widows of those men that would be at all reliable can be based. However, assuming that every one of them who has died left a widow who has not since remarried and also assuming that the widows were approximately ten years younger than their husbands, it is estimated that on March 1, 1908, there will be surviving approximately 400 widows entitled to the benefits of the bill under consideration.

Very respectfully,
F. C. AINSWORTH,
The Adjutant-General.

Hon. HENRY C. LOUDENSLAGER,
Chairman Committee on Pensions, House of Representatives.

A full reprint of Executive Document No. 277 (H. R., 42d Cong., 2d sess.) appears in Executive Document No. 19 (45th Cong., 2d sess.) and gives a detailed narrative of the organization, operations, engagements, casualties, and achievements of these forces. It is deemed unnecessary to reproduce the same herein at length.

The service of these veterans having been acknowledged by the Government in reimbursement of the State of Texas for their pay, and the uniform course of legislation having been to grant service pensions after the lapse of forty years from the war or disturbance on account of which pensions have been granted, and in appreciation of the inestimable value of their service and the perils, privations, and sufferings with which they were beset, all contained in history, your committee respectfully recommend the passage of the bill when amended as follows:

In line 9, after "extended," insert "from the date of the passage of this act."

In lines 10 and 11 strike out "participated" and insert "served."

In line 4, page 2, strike out "who have died."

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

Mr. BORAH. Pursuant to notice, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate Senate bill No. 6206.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6206) for the relief of certain former members of the Twenty-fifth Regiment of United States Infantry.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, on the 13th of August, 1906, in the town of Brownsville and the State of Texas an occurrence took place which has come to be to some extent at least a national question. I presume almost everyone, whether in official life or out of official life, has expressed an opinion in regard to this affair, and with the indulgence of the Senate, in as brief a manner as I may, I now propose to do the same thing.

I shall not likely add any considerable amount of new material to this discussion. Probably I shall add none. But during the somewhat uneventful and leisurely days which a new Member has at his disposal it has occurred to me to go carefully through the evidence, not only that which was taken by the court-martial, but that taken by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, and it has occurred to me also that I might be able in a limited way to assist in abstracting and epitomizing and placing the evidence before the busier members of this body. Not much more than this is it my ambition upon this occasion to do.

I think I ought to say, in order to remove a handicap, in the beginning of this discussion that I have no ambition to appear in any respect as answering the argument of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. I think it a very easy matter to present the evidence which is in the record that discloses who was guilty of the raid at Brownsville. But it is a task entirely beyond my power to answer the Senator from Ohio. So I shall confine myself entirely to the smaller task.

Mr. President, the first question involved here is a simple question of fact, and with the solution of that question of fact all other questions which inhere in this controversy readily settle themselves. I apprehend that there can be no considerable controversy between us with reference to the other questions which are supposed to inhere in the affair, if we shall first be able to determine whether or not any members of the Twenty-fifth Infantry were raiders in the town of Brownsville upon that night. In other words, if it should appear that a part of the soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry stationed at Brownsville entered the city at midnight, when the citizens were defenseless, and assaulted them in their homes, maimed a citizen for life, and took the life of another, I apprehend that no one would contend for a moment that such men should be in the Army.

If it should further appear that a considerable portion, or some of them, who did not actually participate in the raid, necessarily must have known of it, they, too, should not be members of or remain in the Army. For so far as the discipline and the good of the Army are concerned, it is immaterial whether the parties actually participated in the raid or connived at it or concealed knowledge coming to them by means of which the guilty persons could have been punished.

Furthermore, if it should appear from the evidence that, owing to the manner and method of the execution of this conspiracy, owing to the manner and method of the execution of this raid, it is impossible to separate the innocent from the guilty, knowing that there are guilty parties among them, then all should go, because the discipline and the good of the Army is paramount to a man's individual right to contract as a soldier in the United States Army. I would not say that it is paramount to a man's right to liberty or his right to life, but I would say, unhesitatingly, paramount to the mere contractual right which exists between a soldier and the Government, because the very object of having the Army and the object of Government is to give protection to the home, protection to the property and the lives of the citizens. As was once said by General Lee upon a notable occasion, if there be those among them who can not be separated from the guilty, they must suffer for the general good, and certainly no one had a more tender heart for his soldiers than Robert E. Lee.

It is undoubtedly our duty to use every means at our command to ascertain the particular parties who are guilty and to segregate and separate the innocent from the guilty. But if it can not be done, there can be no question, in my mind, as to the necessity of eradicating the cancerous growth even at the expense of some healthy flesh around.

There are a few general observations to make before going to a discussion of the evidence. The first is the nature of the defense which is interposed as an explanation of the incriminating evidence against these soldiers. It has been found necessary, in order to relieve or explain the incriminating facts against the soldiers, to charge that there was a counter conspiracy among the citizens of Brownsville, which conspiracy manufactured evidence so that it could be used against the soldiers.

I do not hesitate to say, and I believe that the discussions concerning this matter will disclose it, that without the existence of that counter conspiracy, unless it is satisfactorily shown, and shown furthermore that they manufactured evidence and placed it against the soldiers, the evidence in this record is overwhelming and conclusive against them. In other words, without this interposing agency in the manufacture of testimony and placing it against the members of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, the evidence becomes direct and positive, and, in my judgment, overwhelming as to their guilt.

It is therefore necessary, in the first instance, to consider this question of a counter conspiracy, because it inheres in the affair. It is a part of the defense, and without it there can be no successful defense to the evidence.

As we watch this citizens' conspiracy operate we shall find that it is charged with doing not only improbable things in order to relieve this incriminating evidence, but what to my mind are impossible things. For instance, the question of the shells and the bullets; without this was manufactured by some active interposing agency, no member of the Senate would contend for a moment that it is not the most direct and positive proof of the guilt of the men charged.

In order that I may not misstate it, because it is an important one, I want to call attention to the position which has been taken with reference to this matter. From the minority report I read:

> The testimony also shows conclusively that it was possible for the citizens to have acquired these cartridges from those left behind by the Twenty-sixth Infantry.

And again, in an article published in the North American Review by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], who understands the position of the defense better than anyone else perhaps, it is said:

> The most careful testimony elicited only showed the animus of the citizens and a reason why they might have attacked the soldiers, but none whatever why the soldiers should attack the citizens.

It is, perhaps, well to stop here for a moment and say that there might be some evidence, and there is possibly some, showing why the citizens might have attacked the soldiers. But I submit that there is no evidence to a reasonable mind why the citizens should have attacked themselves. The soldiers were not attacked. No bullet went in the direction of the garrison, and no soldier was disturbed in the remarkably sound sleep which all were enjoying that night. Again it is said:

> It does not seem to have occurred to anyone to investigate upon the possibility that some of the citizens of Brownsville might have shot up their own town for perfectly obvious and plausible reasons and evident motives.
> If these shells—

Quoting further from the same authority—

> If these shells had been fired from one of the soldiers' rifles they would have been scattered over an area of some 10 feet in diameter. They could not have fallen as they were found, while the six clips found with them would have held thirty instead of only seven cartridges.

The shells in question evidently came from guns which were possessed alone by the soldiers. So it is said that fired as they were they would have been scattered, and the inference therefore is that some active agency had in the first instance stolen the shells and in the second instance scattered the shells at a particular point in such a way as to disclose the act of this interposing agency.

Now, in order to be logical with that proposition, if we assume that they had stolen the shells or had gotten hold of them, we must follow it a step further, and in a few moments we arrive at the conclusion that this same agency was the agency which did the shooting up of the town; and therefore we have opened up as an entirety a conspiracy on the part of the citizens, which conspiracy operated not upon the fort or the soldiers but upon the home people, the wives of their friends, and finally succeeded in taking the life of their own citizen.

It is well to watch as we proceed the working of this conspiracy, because, as I have said, without it there is no other way by which to remove this evidence.

> The shells with which it was identified must therefore have been fired on the target range at Fort Niobrara. That the shells picked up in the streets of Brownsville were not fired there was conclusively shown through microscopic inspection and other ways.
> The presence of those shells in the streets of Brownsville, which had not been fired there, is suggestively accounted for by the fact that Company B took with it to Brownsville as a part of its baggage a box of exploded shells and a proportionate number of clips, and that this box stood open on the back porch of B barracks where anyone passing could have helped himself. The conclusion seems inevitable that the shells were found in the streets of Brownsville because some one for some purpose had taken them from the box and scattered them there on the night of the raid.

And in the remarkably able presentation of this matter a few days ago it was said:

> It would seem more reasonable to suppose that if the shooting of Natus had any reference to the treatment of the soldiers by the saloons, that he was killed by some one who objected to the saloons accommodating the soldiers.

Coming back all the time to the active agency which was operating upon the home citizens, and not upon those against whom they seemed to entertain an ill feeling.

Again, quoting from the minority report, it is said:

The officers and men all testify that except only on the target range at Fort Niobrara there never was in the history of the regiment any such double insertions of cartridges or any occasion for such double insertions. It was the opinion of all the officers and men who testified on the subject that these double insertions never could have occurred except only on the target range at Fort Niobrara. * * * The idea that the raiders would undertake, in the darkness of such a night, under such circumstances, to recover an ejected cartridge that had failed to explode in order that it might be reinserted in the piece is utterly untenable. The same is equally true as to these cartridges showing double indentations.

I have quoted thus for the purpose of getting, if I can, the views of the different parties with reference to the explanation of this evidence. But I want to call attention to another peculiar feature of this conspiracy upon the part of the citizens. It has all the modern improvements. There is not only an original conspiracy, but attached to it is also the conspiracy of silence, against which so much objection has been made upon the part of the soldiers, for, notwithstanding the fact it happened some two years ago, and notwithstanding some forty or fifty citizens must have been engaged in it, and others taken into the workings of it in the way of reaming out the guns, and so forth, some two years have passed, most of them have been on the witness stand, and no one has ever revealed a single fact which would indicate the existence of such a conspiracy so far as their direct evidence is concerned.

It also involves the question of perjury, because it must have been the original design of the conspiracy to fasten this testimony upon the soldier by sworn statements upon the part of some one who was a member of the conspiracy.

These are the positions of the parties who accept the view that the soldiers did not participate in that raid and those who reject it, one claiming that it was a conspiracy upon the part of certain members of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, the other, in order to explain it, claiming that it must have been done by citizens of Brownsville.

Mr. President, I now come to the question of the local feeling which existed at the time. I desire to call attention noticeably to it, for the question of motive inheres in it. It seems that when the soldiers were sent to Fort Brown there was some protest against their being sent there.

Immediately after they arrived this feeling manifested itself in different ways. In the first instance, they were not permitted to go to the bars to drink, except in certain instances they were given separate bars and permitted to enter the door to the bar through an alley. There is plenty of evidence in the record to disclose that this was not at all pleasing to these soldiers. Notwithstanding the fact that it might be argued at this time, or after the trouble happened, that it was not a serious affair, yet the soldiers looked upon it as making a distinction which they did not care to have made.

Again, one of the colored men was coming over from Matamoras and he had in his possession a pen which he had purchased in Mexico. It was taken away from him and some words were passed between the colored gentleman and the customs officer, leading to some discussion at that time which disclosed a manifestation of feeling upon the part of the citizen particularly. Again, another colored man was pushed off the plank into the river by a citizen and another, who was sent out to call in the passes upon the evening of the disturbance, was greeted in a way that led to an unpleasant controversy between them. Another party was passing along the sidewalk and a citizen drew a revolver and knocked him down. Of course, this naturally led to some feeling upon the part of the soldier, as was disclosed by the discussion which took place in regard to it after he reached the fort. Another affair which occurred was one in which it was charged that a colored soldier assaulted a reputable woman residing in the town. All this led to an intense feeling upon the part of the citizens, and undoubtedly to some resentment and feeling upon the part of the soldiers, because it was by reason of this that the passes were cut off and the soldiers were ordered to remain in the fort that night.

Everyone who has lived near a fort or knows anything in regard to it, knows that the soldier loves his pass; and the very fact that the soldiers were placed in a position by reason of this disturbance where they could not enjoy the ordinary facilities and conveniences of a fort led to discussion among them, as the evidence shows, with reference to these particular matters. All these occurrences and disturbances were discussed by them, as stated by the soldiers themselves, prior to the disturbance that night. It is impossible to say how much it takes to furnish a motive for a criminal action; it is impossible to say, where race prejudice inheres, upon what men will act and upon what they will not act; but it is manifestly certain from this record that both the citizens and the soldiers, upon the evening of the 13th of August, 1906, entertained toward one another such a feeling as was calculated to cause a clash if the opportunity presented itself. No one can read this record and come to any other conclusion.

Now, it might be said, and has been said, that this furnished a motive for the citizens to attack the soldiers. That is true; but the unfortunate feature of that, as a logical proposition, is that the soldiers were not attacked, while the citizens were. So it clearly appears who acted upon the motive and who did not.

I want to call attention to a statement here by one of the colored soldiers as to what occurred before and on that night. The evidence is found in the record. I quote from Israel Harris. He says in his testimony:

I thought perhaps the soldiers and citizens had gotten mixed up in some way, and that was why I listened about this roll call.

Q. Why did you think any of the soldiers were mixed up with the citizens?—A. Only from past events down in Texas. We had had some trouble; that is, they claimed—I do not know—that they had been insulted and intruded upon by some of the people when we had been soldiering down in Texas.

Q. Trouble between the soldiers and the citizens?—A. Yes, sir; trouble between the soldiers and the citizens.

Q. Shooting between them?—A. We had some shooting down there, and for that reason I thought, perhaps, something similar to that had happened. In other words, I thought they had gone out and got into a shooting match with the citizens. That flashed across my mind as soon as I heard the shooting. I had heard there was some difficulty about the rights of the soldiers at the bars. I had heard they were not allowed to go into these saloons and be served; that they would not be served unless they went around the back way.

Q. So that from the talk you heard among the men within a limited number of days and from the previous occurrences you spoke of you had reason to think there would be trouble between your soldiers and citizens?—A. I had reason to fear there would be something. * * * I had heard before of depriving the soldiers of the bar privileges and knocking this man down with a pistol and of pushing the soldiers off the gang plank, and all these things were discussed.

It is unreasonable to assume that the soldiers did not resent this treatment; it is unreasonable to assume that, under these conditions, they did not entertain some feeling of ill will toward the citizens, and they clearly disclosed by their evidence that they did. Major Penrose says in his report of August 15, 1906:

That the enlisted men have been subjected to indignities since their arrival here there can be no doubt, and this has caused a good deal of feeling among them and to one case I attribute this outbreak.

He then speaks in reference to Private Newton being knocked down on the streets.

William C. Nolan, who was a soldier, says:

I will not be positive how many nights it was before the shooting, but the negro that was hit in the head with a pistol—I was on night duty at the hospital that night—came up to the hospital that night after I had gone to bed. I got up and went to the door and asked what the trouble was and he said "I am hurt." I walked into the dispensary, set him down in a chair and looked at him and found his face was covered with blood and he had several cuts about his head. I got some water and washed him off and asked him what was the matter. He said, "I was hit on the head with a six-shooter." I asked him who it was hit him and he said, "Oh that is all right, we will get them ——— some day."

Using words which it is not necessary to put in the RECORD.

This condition of affairs, which existed upon the evening of August 13, 1906, became so intense that the major in command felt it necessary to deny his soldiers the right to leave the fort that night; and such a condition, as some of the colored soldiers say, led them to anticipate that there would be some difficulty.

Now, what was the occurrence? What was it that happened upon the night of the 13th of August? About 12 o'clock that night a posse of men—not a straggling individual here and there, but a posse of men—rendezvousing near the fort wall, marched down Elizabeth street, into the alley on to Fourteenth street, on to Washington street, and the different parts of the town, and shot into the homes where they must have known people were living, and shot in such a way as to indicate that they were reaching for the lives of citizens. They did not shoot at the chimneys nor at the houstops, but they shot on a level with where the people would be in the houses, and there was not a step nor a movement upon the part of this conspiracy from the time it rendezvoused at this fort wall until it returned again that did not indicate a determination upon the part of those participating to take life wherever they could find it. It was not a drunken debauch; it was not the act of straggling citizens. It was the act of men actuated by hatred, by ill will and seeking for lives they finally got, or at least some of them. This should be borne in mind when we are asked to believe that the citizens went out and assaulted their own people.

I want now to call attention to some of the first reports which came in in regard to this matter, because it occurs to me that they are a necessary part of this record. Major Penrose, in his telegram to the President, says:

I believe the shooting was done by enlisted men in this place, but have not as yet been able to detect the guilty parties.

Again, he says, later, after having made his investigation:

I am not only convinced that it was perpetrated by men in this command, but that it was carefully planned beforehand.

I want the Senate to remember that at the time Major Penrose made that report he knew all about the question of the gun racks. He knew all about the question of ammunition and of the cleaning of the guns, and as to the roll call and every other feature, except one to which I shall call attention later—all thoroughly understood by the commanding officer of this battalion at the time he sent this message to the President. Not a single circumstance, except the one to which I will call attention, has been developed since that time, which was not fully in the mind or within the knowledge of the commanding officer of this battalion at the time he sent that telegram to the President that a part of his men had been out and committed this crime.

Some one has said that there was undue haste. Where could there be more direct evidence of the unfitness of men to be members of the Army than the statement of the commanding officer who had and has always shown that he was and is in sympathy with the colored soldiers?

Major Blocksom says:

That the raiders were soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry can not be doubted. The evidence of many witnesses of all classes is conclusive. The shattered bullet shells and clips found are merely corroborative.

I do not know Major Blocksom, and you will have to take his antecedents from others. The President has said in one of his messages that he was born in Ohio. Of course that is entirely to his credit. The Senator from Ohio, in answer to that, says that his father was a Democrat, for which, of course, Major Blocksom is greatly to blame. I shall not undertake to answer either one of these charges. I simply say that Major Blocksom's report agrees entirely with the report of Major Penrose, who was at all times and has at all times been in sympathy with the soldiers. The report of the assistant United States district attorney of Texas, September 6, 1906, says:

The city of Brownsville without doubt has suffered a terrible and unreasonable attack by soldiers who should have acted just the opposite in affording them protection.

I want to call attention to a resolution which was passed by the friends of the soldiers a short time after this occurrence, but after a large portion of the facts had been printed. This is a resolution adopted by some of the colored citizens of Boston:

Brooding on repeated insults and outrages, a few of these colored soldiers went into the town on the night of August 13 last, with their guns, determined to do for themselves what the uniform of their country could not do for them and what the police power of white Brownsville would not do for them, to wit, protect them from such insults and outrages and punish at the same time the authors of their misery.

If we want to understand the motive, and that which the colored soldiers considered was sufficient and efficient, we get it from the language of their brothers when they passed the resolutions in their defense. The way in which it would operate upon the minds of those men can be gathered to some extent from the manner in which it operated upon the minds of their brothers when they read this evidence—not that they were innocent or did not participate in it, but that they went out to do what the uniform of the United States soldier would not do, namely, to execute revenge upon those against whom they entertained this view.

I say, too, here, by way of digression, that at the time the order came to dismiss these men from these companies there was not a discordant note upon the part of the officers or friends or anyone else as to the guilt of these men. Everyone who had been called upon to investigate came to the same conclusion; and when the evidence reached the President of the United States but one conclusion had been arrived at by all who had been called upon to act, and that was that the evidence was overwhelming and conclusive.

I have some further quotations which I desire to present. They are as follows:

REPORT OF CITIZENS' COMMITTEE.

A few moments before midnight on Monday, the 13th, a body of the United States soldiers of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, colored, numbering between twenty and thirty men, emerged from the garrison inclosure carrying their rifles and an abundant supply of ammunition, and began firing in town and directly into dwellings, offices, stores, and at police and citizens. During this firing, one citizen, Frank Natus, was killed, etc.

FROM REPORT OF INSPECTOR-GENERAL GARLINGTON, OCTOBER 22, 1906.

It has been established by careful investigation beyond reasonable doubt that the firing into the houses of the citizens of Brownsville while the inhabitants thereof were pursuing their peaceful vocations or sleeping, and by which one of the citizens was killed and the chief of police so seriously wounded that he lost an arm, was done by enlisted men of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, belonging to the battalion stationed at Fort Brown.

LETTER OF GENERAL NETTLETON, NOVEMBER 27, 1906.

There was simply a cold-blooded conspiracy of the most cowardly possible sort to terrorize the entire community and kill or injure men, women, and children in their homes and beds or on the streets, and this at an hour of night when concerted or effective resistance or defense was out of the question, and when detection by identification of the uniformed criminals outside of the garrison was well-nigh impossible.

I read now from the testimony of Lieutenant Grier. He said:

The circumstantial evidence was such that no reasonable man could think, hardly, but what some of the soldiers had been implicated in it—a reasonable man could not come to any other conclusion at that time.

I am aware that these men afterwards modified their views—a proposition to which I hope to come later.

Captain Macklin says:

It looked to me as though the men had done the shooting. It seemed so on account of the shells. It looked very much so. I continued of that opinion right along. I could not believe anything else.

It is well to bear in mind here that Captain Macklin is the man who found the shells bunched, and this fact was a fact known to him at the time he came to the conclusion that they were guilty. The only man who ever saw these shells in that condition was Captain Macklin, and he was in full possession of the information at the time he came to the conclusion on that question that these men participated in the raid, and every other fact and circumstance, save one, to which I will call attention later, was then within the knowledge of this officer.

Now, we come to the direct evidence in regard to the affair. These were but collateral matters which it seemed necessary to go over before taking up the direct evidence. I call attention, in the first place, to the condition of the night and to the lights of the city. It has been suggested that it was impossible to see under the conditions in which these parties claim they saw the soldiers. In the first place, there were two large lights over the gate which marks the entrance through a fort wall into the garrison. Then there were three lights upon Washington street, and three lights upon Elizabeth street, aside from the lights which were in the houses as testified to by the witnesses.

I want to call here attention to the testimony, not of a citizen, but to some of the other parties. Israel Harris testified:

Q. And you do not think anybody came into that entrance while you were there?—A. No, sir; I do not think a soul came in.—Q. Was there light enough so you could have determined if anyone had come in?—A. There were a couple of lights over the gate.—Q. Oil lamps?—A. Yes, sir. The light was clear so that I could see as well as I can in this room.

This is the statement of a colored soldier, and he is speaking with reference to that particular place where Mr. Rendall says he saw these soldiers rendezvous right there under the lights at the gate of the garrison. Mr. Harris says the light was sufficient so that he could see as well as he could in the room where he was sitting.

Major Penrose says:

Captain Lyon called his company right out and we followed him out in the road. As he was posting his company there Sergeant Taliferro reported to me at that time armed with a rifle. I saw the rifle. There was a light on the gate and for a short distance back you could see people, probably 20 feet, readily.

Mayor Combe, who was also the physician at the post, says:

There were two lights, one on either side of the gate of the barracks. On the corner of Fourteenth and Elizabeth streets, at the corner of the Leahy Hotel, there was a light. The next light was one in front of the Miller Hotel office, an acetylene, and one in the courtyard of Miller's Hotel, also an acetylene light. The next light was on the corner of Wreford's office, diagonally across from Miller's Hotel. The next light was on Elizabeth street at the corner of the Merchants' National Bank on Elizabeth and Twelfth streets. There was also a light on the cornor of Fourteenth and Washington streets, and also at the corner of Thirteenth and Washington streets. There was a light at the corner of Twelfth and Washington streets. There was also a light on Elizabeth in front of Crexell's saloon.

This is the territory over which the raiders went upon the night in question, and it will be found that there was sufficient and efficient light to discern and individualize parties, so far as their dress was concerned, without any inconvenience whatever, especially when they were passing near the lights, as they were at the Cowen house, at the Miller Hotel, at the Leahy Hotel, and at the other places where they were particularly identified.

With this brief mention of the question of the lights, I now ask attention for a short time to the eyewitnesses of this disturbance. The first important witness is Mr. Rendall. He lived in the upper story of what is known as the "Western Union Telegraph Building." His window fronted out upon the garrison, overlooking directly Barracks B and the fort. He testifies that upon the night of the 13th of August he heard some shots, got up and went to the window, looked out and saw some men moving about, and that as four or five of them passed down under these lights he easily distinguished them as colored soldiers in their uniforms.

I want you to bear in mind that he does not claim to have identified as soldiers all the men whom he saw, but he does claim to have identified those whom he saw passing under the lights which have been described by Israel Harris, and about that he says he can not be mistaken.

It is claimed that this witness is contradicted by McDonald and by the fact that he is blind in one eye. Let us see. McDonald lived upon the corner of Adams street and Fifteenth street, over two blocks away. Rendall says that when he heard five or six shots the men immediately went over the wall. McDonald says he heard five or six shots and that he then got up from his bed, partially dressed, went down to Fifteenth street, and from Fifteenth street went down to what is known as the alley between Washington and Elizabeth streets, and after he had reached this alley for the first time he saw the soldiers.

It is not claimed by Mr. Rendall that he saw the soldiers go over the wall at the time that Mr. McDonald was in a position to see them if they had gone over the wall. Rendall says that he saw them immediately after the five or six shots were fired, and McDonald says the five or six shots were fired, upon which he got up and dressed and then moved down a block and a half to a position where he was enabled to see these men; but McDonald does say that he saw them at the point where Rendall says they were after going over the wall. He says that they were colored soldiers; that they were dressed in the uniform of the United States soldier; that they were in possession of their arms, and that they immediately left that particular point and went down to the center of the city.

I have read and reread the testimony of McDonald and Mr. Rendall, and, with all due respect to a different interpretation, I have been unable to find any contradiction as between the statement of those two witnesses. I do not say that it does not exist. There are others who are more familiar with the evidence, who heard it given, but I do say that I have been unable, after the most searching effort, to find a single point of contradiction between Mr. Rendall and Mr. McDonald. They were not looking at the men at the same time, they did not have an opportunity to see them at the same time, and they were not testifying with reference to the same point of time when they testified.

I now read from the testimony of Mr. McDonald and Mr. Rendall, as follows:

George W. Rendall, age, 72 years; residence, Brownsville; business, mechanical and civil engineer. Residence in the upper story of the Western Union Telegraph office building, on the front of the Government wall, and is right on the corner of Elizabeth and Fifteenth streets.

On the night of the 13th I was asleep and shots awakened me. I went to the window facing toward the garrison. The house is about 35 feet from the brick wall of the garrison. I looked out of the window and at the right at the entrance of the big gate going into the garrison there were two large lights, and my attention was naturally called toward those lights, because the shots were apparently at the right-hand side of me. I saw from three to five men coming apparently toward the big gate as though they were going out into Elizabeth street. * * * Just as I glanced at them, there was a shot to the left that drew my attention that way. * * * I looked up to the left and saw a number of men, ten or twelve, and as my vision rested on those there were two shots fired. * * * Those shots were inside the inclosure of the barracks. The men were grouped together. They were apparently coming from different places. I moved from one window to another. When I looked at them again, on running to the window overlooking the garrison, they were close to the wall inside the garrison. They were huddled in there, apparently, and I could see from the reflection of the light. * * * The next thing I saw of these men they were going over the wall, and after they got into Fifteenth street I could not tell which way they went. They were out of my sight. * * * The only men I identified sure were those first seen when I was looking out of the window. They were close up under the light. I think there were five. They were colored men with the Army uniform. They collected together, apparently with the intention of going over the wall, at one place. * * * My house was shot into that night. The shot passed through five thicknesses of lumber, through my mosquito bar, over my bed, and through four thicknesses of lumber on the other side. At the time it penetrated the house my wife and I were looking out of the window facing on Elizabeth street. * * * I am positive these men were colored soldiers which I saw inside of the wall.

James P. McDonald lives at Brownsville. On the night of the 13th of August was living on Adams street, near fifteenth, on an irregular block there. I fronted on Adams street. I was in my house on the night of the 13th, and I heard some shooting. The first thing I heard was some shots that night. They seemed to be down toward Elizabeth street. I had no window looking out that way. There was a window toward the garrison wall, but there were two houses between me and the garrison wall, so I could not see the garrison from the window. * * * I heard some four or five or six shots. I had not retired for the night; I was laying down, but not fully undressed. When I heard these shots, I got up and put on my shoes; probably I picked up my hat, and I proceeded down Fifteenth street and then down to the alley between Elizabeth street and Washington street. * * * I took about two or three minutes to get down. When I got to that point there were two shots fired—that is, at the alley. I did not see anybody in the street in front of the wall until just after I heard those shots. Just after the shot was fired I turned my attention down the street, and I saw some men collecting right at the corner of Elizabeth and the garrison wall road. It looked to me like there might have been eighteen or twenty.

They were out in the street. They had guns and had on uniforms. I could see them quite distinctly. They were right up against the Western Union Telegraph Building. I did not see anyone jump over the wall. The wall was not always in my view, for when I would be looking down the street the wall would be at my left. At that particular time I was in a position where I could have seen them if they had jumped over the wall. These men came up to the mouth of the alley. I got up close to the Yturria fence and moved away from them as swiftly as I could. They came up and turned in the alley, then I came back to the corner and watched them. They were very nearly through the alley. They were negroes in United States uniform.

Again, Mrs. Rendall testifies that she went to the window and saw these parties at the same time, or practically the same time. A little incident occurred here which, it seems to me, indicates beyond a question the veracity of Mr. Rendall and Mrs. Rendall. At the time that they were standing near their window a shot was fired which passed through both sides of the house and within a few feet of the old lady, Mrs. Rendall. If we will stop to consider that incident alone for a moment, it indicates to a reasoning mind who it was who was doing the shooting. It does not seem possible that the citizens of that town would have organized a conspiracy and gone down under the eaves of the barracks, started their conspiracy, and the first thing turn their guns upon one of the elderly ladies of that city. The very instinct of the situation, the very intuition of the condition, would have suggested that they fire in another direction, in the direction of those against whom they entertained a feeling of malice.

Something has been said with reference to the eyesight of Mr. Rendall. I want to call attention to it for a moment, because it is evident that Mr. Rendall had one eye and he was able to discern these soldiers, not only when they were not under command, but when they were. I quote from his testimony:

Senator FORAKER. Senator WARNER asked if you had but one eye. Do I understand you are blind in the other?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you been blind in this one eye?—A. I have been blind in this right eye since 1866.

Q. Did you have an accident at that time?—A. Yes, sir. There was a splinter from a piece of steel struck my eye.

Q. I notice you wear glasses. How is the strength of your other eye?—A. Well, I could not estimate that. It has come on me so by degrees, my sight failing, but apparently I can see with proper glasses as well as I ever could. I can read the finest print and I can see at a long distance nearly as well as I could when I was 35 or 40 years of age. * * *

Q. Were you without glasses this night?—A. I could not say. I am under the impression that I put my glasses on. I think I gave that idea to Colonel Glenn, but I am not positive about that. I can conscientiously say that I do not know whether I put my glasses on that night or not, but usually I have them on a stand right alongside the bed, and when I get up in the morning I put my glasses on.

Q. You see all the objects in this room distinctly, don't you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you tell how many men are at the end of the room, without any difficulty?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It is no trouble to you to tell?—A. No trouble at all.

Q. Could you tell if they were a hundred feet farther away?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Tell how many there were and the color of them?—A. Well, there are two black men there at the end of the room.

Q. You see them distinctly?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You have no trouble in distinguishing parties near you and you would not if they were farther away?—A. No, sir.

Q. Now, do you see in the daylight at that distance without your glasses?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Distinctly?—A. Well, not as distinctly as I can with them.

Q. You can tell how men were dressed 100 feet away from you in daylight?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. Without your glasses?—A. Very well.

Q. Tell the color of their clothes, whether they had on hats or caps, and all such things as that?—A. Certainly.

We come to another incident in which the eyesight of this man was tested. For another purpose it became essential apparently to show that immediately after the roll call one of the officers took his soldiers out into the town, and Mr. Rendall, standing at the same window, looking out from the same point, and with the same eye, distinctly identified what was going on, as is proven by those who contend that he did not have good eyesight:

Q. You remained there, looking out of the window for some time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see a company form and march into town?—A. I saw a squad. I do not know whether there was a company.

Q. Then, how many?—A. I did not count them.

Q. Can you give us an idea?—A. I should judge there were fifteen or twenty.

Q. Did they come out at the gate?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were they under command of an officer?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where did they go when they came out of the gate?—A. They came out of the gate and turned and went up on the sidewalk. There was a mudhole in the street there. They came up on the sidewalk, passed right through on my sidewalk, and went up Elizabeth street.

Q. They went up Fifteenth street, didn't they?—A. No, sir; Elizabeth street.

Q. Captain Lyon testified how he took his company and went out and patrolled the town.—A. He took his company up Elizabeth street to Twelfth street and then turned up.

Identifying the captain and those who were in charge of the soldiers.

Of course, it is an admitted fact that he had only one eye, but it does seem clear from the record that he used that eye with considerable success upon that night in both instances.

I call attention to the testimony of another eyewitness, who certainly was not a member of that "citizen's conspiracy," a man who was in a position to see and to know and to feel, because during the engagement he lost an arm. This is Dominguez, the lieutenant of police:

Age, 58; lieutenant of police. Four years in the custom-house at Brownsville. Last eight years was lieutenant of police. At eight minutes till 12 o'clock on the night of the 13th of August I was at the market waiting to hear the bell ring at the schoolhouse. I heard shooting toward the garrison. I proceeded toward the garrison on Washington street. I got to Fourteenth street and Policeman Padrone was there, and I asked him what the shooting was about. He told me they had just gotten through shooting at Cowen's house—that is, the soldiers. I was on horseback, a gray horse. I got down and girthed the saddle, and just as I got off the horse I saw four soldiers pass, run right across the alley. From there I returned to the corner of Fourteenth street, on Washington street. Then I returned back. I was on Fourteenth street and Washington street and the soldiers came up Fourteenth street on up the alley. I crossed the alley in front of the Miller Hotel.

I heard a word by the gate, the Miller Hotel, just in the alley, "Give them hell." Just about that time I crossed the alley. There were two files of soldiers, one on each side the alley. * * * I could see distinctly they were colored soldiers. They had uniforms. After the words, "Give them hell," there was a volley fired. I went down the street giving an alarm, because I thought I could not stand against fifteen or twenty men. I proceeded on Thirteenth street, and immediately afterwards they came up to the Miller Hotel on Thirteenth street. They came up into Thirteenth street, from the alley into Thirteenth street. At that time I was between two lights, one at the corner of Wreford's and one at the corner of Bolack's corner. They were shooting at me and I was looking back. These men came out of the alley and were colored soldiers, and there were about fifteen or twenty, more or less. They had their guns.

They shot me. That was on the corner of Elizabeth and Thirteenth streets; also killed my horse.

Q. You had no doubt they were colored soldiers?—A. No doubt in the world.

One can not read the testimony of this lieutenant of police and doubt that he was in a position to see or doubt the fact that he did see. It might be argued that he could not detect the color of a man's face as far as he said he did, but it can not be successfully contended, it seems to me, that a man in the position in which he was, contending with his deadly foes, as they were passing under that light, could not detect how they were dressed. It is unreasonable and improbable that this man was a member of the conspiracy when he lost his arm in attempting to save the lives of the citizens of that town. There must be some other reason alleged besides a citizen's conspiracy before this direct and incriminating evidence is taken from off the shoulders of these men.

I come now, after passing several other witnesses whose testimony I will ask to insert in the RECORD, to the testimony of another witness, and that is Amada Martinez, a working girl, who was in the house owned by the Cowen family. This to me is one of the strongest pieces of evidence in this affair. Here was a girl who could not have had any membership in a conspiracy. She could not have had any considerable feeling with reference to the situation which prevailed, and upon the night that the Cowen house was attacked she went to the window when she heard the shots and undertook to close the window blinds. When she looked out of the window, there were facing her, within 5 to 10 feet, ten or twelve men, whom she says she identified without any question. How are you going to take away the testimony of that kind of a witness? What reason for perjury on her part? That she was in a position to see is undoubted, because they shot the lamp off the table within 2 feet of her. That she saw, according to her belief, can not be gainsaid; and no reason can be suggested why this witness should go upon the stand twice and testify to a deliberate falsehood. I call attention, too, that twice she appeared before the ablest counsel in this country, where she was subjected to cross-examination, and she did not vary her testimony the width of a hair. If it had been false, it could not have stood the test. She simply saw what she saw when she saw it.

You might say that the owner of a saloon, a gambler, a rowdy about town, was a member of a conspiracy to kill their own, but you can not say that the working girls of that town and people from all classes were members of that conspiracy and satisfy a reasonable mind upon the proposition. There is only one explanation given, and that is that the members of this home citizens' conspiracy darkened their faces, stole the uniforms of the soldiers, marched down the street, and tried to kill this working girl in the Cowen house.

I now call attention to the testimony of Mrs. Kate Leahy, who kept a hotel. She said she does not know what physical fear is, and I agree with her. She hid two policemen that night, and went across the street and took care of the family while the fight was going on. That she did these things is unquestioned. She is another witness who saw, and has narrated with rare certainty, with circumstantial certainty, precisely what she did see. She said:

My husband was a soldier in the Eighth Cavalry. I have lived in Brownsville all my life; am a hotel keeper. My house is on the corner of Elizabeth and Fourteenth streets. I was there when the colored troops came; never had any trouble with them. I was in my bedroom when the shooting commenced, but had not gone to bed. The first shot was in the direction of the post. Then it came down toward my house. * * * The shooting was from high-power rifles. I went upstairs and saw them shooting off the galleries. My house is two stories. I went downstairs and walked out into the street, because I thought it was a fire on Elizabeth street. Then the first volley that came surprised me, and when the second volley came I realized that the town was being shot on and I went back and went upstairs. I heard them still shooting in the alley. They stopped, turned around, and shot into Cowen's house. They stopped in the middle of the street. When they stopped in the middle of the street, one man touched the other on the shoulder and looked up at the window where I was and said something that I could not understand. The other man looked up and said, "No; keep straight ahead and shoot to the front," and a volley was shot down the alley toward the Miller Hotel. I saw the faces distinctly of these two men. They were two negroes. They had soldiers' clothes on, khaki suits, and one had a blue shirt. They were in plain view at that time in the middle of the street. The shooting then continued up toward the Miller Hotel. Besides these two men, there were fourteen other men with them. I counted them. I might have made a mistake in the count, but I doubt it. They were in khaki uniforms, but I could not see except the two distinctly in the faces, but they were dressed in soldiers' uniforms. I am quite clear about that. These two I speak of were looking straight at me. I saw them. There were two bullet holes went into my kitchen and four in the back fence. I saw them again that night. In about fifteen minutes my daughter, my sister, one of Mr. Cowen's children, and Mr. Elkins saw six of them running to the post. And I presume an hour afterwards I saw one of them that did the shooting in the alley come back with Captain Lyon and his company again.

Q. You think one of those men you saw with Captain Lyon was with those men you saw in the street?—A. I do not think so, sir; I am positive of it. I was standing at my front gate near Captain Lyon's company post. They passed within 5 or 6 feet.

The next witness to whose testimony I call attention is Hale Odin, who was stopping temporarily in the town of Brownsville. He was not a citizen of Brownsville and was not permanently located there. I think he was born in Detroit, Mich., is a graduate of Ann Arbor, a man of some respectability and standing, apparently, and it does not seem from the record that there is any reason why he should state that which was false, or how a man of his intelligence and observation and with his opportunity to see could have been mistaken. He says:

Age, 54; business, land and immigration; born in Detroit, Mich.; graduated at Ann Arbor, class of '72; married. Was in Brownsville the night of August 13, 1906. About 11.55 on the night of August 13, I was sitting in the alley window of our bedroom in the Miller Hotel, on the second floor, when I heard shots in the direction of the alley toward the fort. I noted the time. It was five minutes till 12. I counted about sixty shots before they arrived at our window. I called my wife, and she and my little boy came to the window, and I heard persons on the run coming toward us in the alley from the direction of the fort. And when they had passed our window I counted six negro soldiers, three abreast, in two columns, with one soldier running along the side who stopped across the alley opposite our window, and one large negro soldier gave the order "halt" and said, "There he goes, shoot," and they fired a volley.

Immediately one other negro soldier joined them from the same direction from which the other seven had come. Then there were four more negroes followed and joined the other eight. These four came ahead from the direction of Fort Brown through the alley. Before the first soldiers arrived I noticed a large black dog running through the alley ahead of the soldiers, and supposed it was a mad dog they were chasing and shooting at. Then one large soldier stepped back to the center of the alley slightly in the rear of the other eleven and raised his gun, and another volley was fired. Immediately following this report a large negro with a freckled face fired point-blank at us. The ball from his rifle passed through the lower window sash and up into the ceiling, and the bullet fell back upon the floor. I picked it up the next morning and later forwarded it to the Secretary of War. We had a lamp in the room burning. From the flashes of the guns I could see the soldiers distinctly, and I discerned their uniforms and dress and the color of their faces. Seven of the soldiers had on their usual dark-brown uniforms. Four were without jackets, one without a hat, bareheaded, they all carried rifles, and one carried a revolver. When the two volleys were fired the negro soldier that gave the order said, "We got that s—— of a b——." I heard a heavy fall as of a horse or some animal and a groan which sounded like a groan of a dying horse. Then I heard a scream from a man, and immediately following this I heard some running northward up the street which faces the Miller Hotel, which is Elizabeth street. Then an order was given to "shoot this way," and a volley was fired to the right on Thirteenth street.

Then they crossed Thirteenth street nearly to the opposite side and fired a volley into the Miller Hotel. I had left the window facing on the alley and had gone to the Thirteenth street window. My wife was opposite me. I saw twelve men at that point. I counted them and said to my wife, "There are just twelve of them." After firing at the Miller Hotel they passed northward up the alley. Some may have gone east on Thirteenth street without my seeing them. In about two minutes after they passed northward I counted five more shots, and in about two minutes twelve negroes appeared again, going toward Fort Brown, and crossed Thirteenth street and entered the alley at the rear of the Miller Hotel. They were going double-quick and passed out of my sight. I did not hear any more shots. The lights from the street lamps from Elizabeth street and Washington street gave us plenty of light to distinguish them plainly and their dress and to tell distinctly that they were negroes. I could see their faces distinctly when they looked up toward the window, and I state positively they were negroes in United States uniforms.

I now call attention to the evidence of the following additional eyewitnesses:

PADRON.—When I had concealed myself in the obscure place when the lieutenant crossed the alley and had gone a short distance I saw three soldiers pointing in the direction he was going, and they said, "There goes one; fire at him." Then I saw the three fire at him, and I saw others coming. I knew they were soldiers, because they wore the uniform of soldiers.

CHARLES E. HAMMOND.—Toward the alley from the window is a door. The shooting seemed to be all around the hotel. While I stood in that corner I heard a man go by on horseback, and I heard a nigger say, "There goes the s— of a b——; let him have it," and I heard a muffled conversation. I do not know whether I could see every shot, but I could see the flashes of the gun through the crack of the window and under the door.

RAMIREZ.—The lieutenant went on crossing the alley. He crossed over the alley and I remained at the outside about 30 feet from him; that is, 30 feet from the point where I was to the mouth of the alley. As he crossed the alley I heard a voice within the alley which said as follows: "There goes one. Is he a soldier? If not, give him hell." * * * I remained there. The lieutenant had passed the alley a short distance when the group of soldiers came out with carbines and fired at him. The light which shone through the window of the closet of the hotel, together with the light on the corner of Washington street, gave sufficient light for me to recognize them as soldiers. * * * After they shot they said, "Here are two more," and when they said, "Here are two more," I immediately left the point and retreated rapidly, at which time they fired at us. * * *

Q. Did you recognize whether they were colored soldiers or not?—A. Yes, sir; they were colored soldiers.

Q. How did you recognize they were colored soldiers?—A. Because I saw them with my eyes.

CANADA.—Newspaper business. As this policeman and his horse fell I heard voices that I took to be the voices of negroes. I do not have the least doubt about it.

V. S. FERNANDEZ.—Twenty-five years of age; reside in Brownsville; been on the police force about three years; deputy sheriff before that. When I first heard the shooting I was asleep on Washington street. I heard the shooting down toward the barracks. I ran down Eleventh street, and from there to Mrs. Bolack's on Twelfth street, and there I heard Mr. Preciado hollering for an officer. I went there and I named him and another man by the name of Alanis as officers. I saw Frank Natus lying there wounded. Preciado was shot in his coat and his hand was wounded, and about 3 feet from the cistern in the yard was Frank Natus, a young boy about 20 years old, lying down. I did not see anyone who did the shooting.

VALDEZ CALDERON.—Live in Brownsville for twenty-five years; was on the police force for eight years. I heard the shooting that night of August 13. Did not see any of the parties. I first heard shooting in the direction of the gate of barracks and near Elizabeth street, and then it went in the direction toward the center of the city. I went in the direction of the shooting two squares. I heard many more shots. I did not go down and attempt to arrest them. One of my companions, who was with me, Rivas, who had been a soldier, said: "Those shots are not pistol shots, but it is a gun of the soldiers." I then went to the city hall to receive orders.

HERBERT ELKINS.—About 18 years of age; live in Brownsville. On the night of August 13 was living at the Leahy Hotel in the second story. I had just gone to bed when I heard the first shot. I was not asleep. It sounded like it was just about the post wall. I sat up and was leaning on the window and saw two men running up toward Fourteenth street, and when they got about 6 or 8 or 10 feet from the mouth of the alley one of them ran into a soft, muddy place and called to the other man not to run ahead or he would get in the mudhole. They stepped out there and fired two or three shots in Cowen's house. Then they reloaded and emptied their guns, I suppose; anyway, they fired about five rounds apiece, and one had trouble with his gun, and both of them together fixed it. They then ran on up the alley and across Fourteenth street, back of the hotel. They had on khaki leggings and pants, and one of them had a blue shirt and a belt. The other man was dressed in the same way except that he might have had on a coat. After these men had passed across Fourteenth street into the alley back of the hotel, I saw a bunch of soldiers, negro soldiers, come running up the alley. They turned around the corner and directly in front of the Cowen house into Fourteenth street. They stopped between my window and the Cowen gate. They stopped as if they did not know what to do, and then I heard a voice calling to them. Then they turned around. The voice said something like this: "Come this way," or "Come here." They then went toward the voices toward the window and I stepped back. They shot two or three times. I recognized them as negroes. I could tell that. Of course some were standing behind others. They had on khaki uniforms worn by soldiers. Those in front I could see had guns. * * * I occupied a room next the alley. My window fronted on Fourteenth street.

FRED E. STARCK.—Thirty-nine years old; married; have a wife and seven children; my residence in Brownsville is on Washington street, close to Thirteenth street. I was at home on the night of August 13. The Miller Hotel was situated southwest from me. There were eight shots fired into my house. Every bullet which went into the house went clear through it. I went out next morning and picked up some shells, and I think they were Springfield rifle shells. I picked up the shells right in the middle of the street in front of my house. My house is about 15 or 16 feet from Mr. Tate's house.

C. B. CHACE.—Locomotive engineer; 51 years of age; native of Massachusetts. Was stopping at the Miller Hotel the night of August 13. I retired as usual about 9.30. I was awakened by a volley of shooting over toward the barracks. I got up and looked out of the window. After being there a short time I heard four or five voices holler, "Put out that light." I glanced farther up the street and saw the lieutenant of police turn into the street on horseback. I watched him coming down the street until he passed under my window, and just after he passed under my window I saw two men coming out of the alley back of the Miller Hotel and cross Thirteenth street, and when they got on the opposite side of the street they stopped and fired several shots. I heard the bullets whizzing around my window and I ducked my head and got away. A few seconds after there was another volley of shooting on the side of Thirteenth street, under my window. After the shooting was all over I got up and looked out of the window and saw the horse of the lieutenant lying down on Elizabeth street. * * *

Q. How many of these men did you see?—A. I saw two men who had soldier's clothes on—that is, they were dressed like soldiers, the same uniforms, leggings, etc. * * * There was a great deal of excitement. The women were screaming and hysterical.

JOSEPH BODIN.—Railroad fireman. Was running with C. B. Chace on August 13. I was stopping at the Miller Hotel. I was awakened by the shooting. I first heard several shots in the direction of the barracks, and then I heard a volley or two afterwards. The shooting came up in the direction of the Miller Hotel. I did not go down at all. The Miller Hotel is on the corner of Thirteenth and Elizabeth streets. While they were doing the shooting around the Miller Hotel I was in the window, and while at the window I heard the footsteps of a horse coming from Washington street toward me. Just as I heard them coming, with a man on him, I heard shots, and they were shooting at him as he passed under me, and when he got to Elizabeth street the horse fell. I looked and saw two men dressed in United States uniform crossing the street, and just as they got about 10 feet on the far side of the alley, they turned and fired in my direction, and then I went in and did not come out no more.

Q. Did you form an opinion as to whether they were soldiers or not?—A. Yes, sir; they were, according to the clothes they wore.

Q. Have you ever had any doubt since?—A. No, sir; I could see distinctly the character of the uniforms, and I think they were soldiers.

A. N. MACKEY.—My age is 39. I am a banker. Formerly lived in Iowa; native of Illinois. I am in the banking business. I was in Brownsville the night of August 13, and stopped at the Miller Hotel, on the second floor in the front room. I heard severe firing. It seemed to come from toward Fort Brown. The firing seemed to be fierce over toward the fort, and then it came up the alley back of the hotel. In the first place, the sound appeared to start from Fort Brown, and then the character of the report impressed me as not being that of an ordinary rifle or sporting gun. I was not alarmed at first, but the people in the hotel were, especially the women and children. They were screaming and were hysterical. I saw two marks in the hotel; bullet marks. I went down to the Cowen house the next morning, and it was literally riddled with bullets; must have been twelve or fifteen.

JOSE MARTINEZ.—Lived at Brownsville. Clerk in a drug store. My home was in Brownsville on the night of August 13 right in front of the barracks, between Washington and Elizabeth streets, at the corner of the alley and Fifteenth streets. I was keeping batch. Just before 12 o'clock I heard four or five shots at the same time. I had not yet gone to bed. The shot was right in front of my door, inside of the garrison, between the garrison wall and the barracks. When I heard the first shots I tried to go out and see what was the trouble and I heard voices calling "hurry up" or "jump." I blew out the light and lay down on the floor. I could not say positively that I saw people go over the wall, but I heard them jump. Some moments after I heard people running toward the center of the town along the alley. I saw four or five. I could distinguish the uniform, but it was impossible to distinguish, or, I did not pay any attention to the countenances. * * * The four or five men whom I saw went toward the Cowen house. There were others, but I could not see in what direction they went. They had guns and carried them with the stock at the hip. I recognized them as soldiers. I lay down on the floor because I was afraid. * * * After the parties passed my house, the next firing I heard was in the direction of the center of the town. I heard a great many shots, possibly 150 or 200.

Cross-examination by Senator FOSTER:

A. There is no doubt about my hearing those men jump over the wall and there is no doubt whatever, as I saw them with my own eyes, that they were dressed in uniforms and carrying guns. I could not recognize the faces, but I could see they were dressed in United States uniforms and had guns.

A. H. SANBORN.—Reside at Brownsville; manager of the Western Union Telegraph Company's office. Held that position for thirty years. The night of the 13th I was sleeping in my room immediately at the rear of the telegraph office, same building. I was awakened by heavy firing. The report was evidently of high-power rifles—some seven or eight shots. I had no idea in the world what it was. I got up and opened the slats of the blinds and looked out, and just as I was looking I saw come along by the whitewashed garrison fence—and I saw plainly, because there was a lamp on each side of the large gate—I saw a man going along. He was a colored man in uniform and had his gun. I could see him very distinctly. The lights over the gate showed him plainly against the light gray wall. He was probably not over 25 or 30 feet away. I recognized him as a colored man and a soldier.

CHARLES H. THORNE.—Age 50 years. Resided at Brownsville. Am a dentist. I was in my house the night of the 13th near the Miller Hotel. I was about to drop off to sleep when I heard firing. I did not at first turn over, but when it kept up I began to think something was up. I raised up in bed and I found the firing was coming nearer. It was on my right, toward the garrison. It came nearer and nearer. After while, when there was such a number of them fired, I concluded that the soldiers were trying to terrify the police and I thought I would get up and look out. The window was up and the blinds were closed and I could hear them. I could tell from the voices they were negroes talking to themselves, and one of them spoke in a loud tone of voice, referring to some one who was down the alley, evidently, saying, "There they go," or "There he goes," I do not remember which, and one said, "Give him hell." I was perfectly satisfied at the time they were negroes from their voices. I had no doubt of that whatever. At the time I heard their voices I was about 30 or 40 feet from them.

Y. GARZA.—Clerk at the Yturria House. Lived in Brownsville about thirteen years. My mother and father are Mexicans. On the night of the 13th I was at my house, which is on Fourteenth street between Washington and Elizabeth streets. I am right in front of the Cowen house. I am a married man. I was awakened by some shots in the direction of the garrison. Then I heard the shooting by the alley where I lived. It was high-power rifles. Then there was some shooting in front of the Cowen house. It seemed to me there were about thirty shots there. I did not see any of the persons who did the shooting. My wife and I were very much frightened. I could hear the working or pumping of the guns. My wife and I both could hear that. When I entered my house after the shooting I could hear some one running through the alley—sounded like three or four running in the direction of the post.

MRS. HELEN MOORE.—Age, 43; am in Brownsville in the hotel business, the Miller Hotel, situated on the corner of Thirteenth and Elizabeth streets. I was in my room the night of the 13th. Had gone to bed when the shooting commenced. My room was in the second story. When I first heard the shooting it was in the direction of the barracks. Then it came straight down toward my house between the alley. I stood there and watched out of the window until they fired another volley right at the corner of the alley on Fourteenth street, and we could see the flashes of the guns. Then they came right down the alley toward the hotel. They were shooting as they came, and we dropped right down below the window and crawled into the hallway, and then Mr. Goldsmith, the young man boarding with us, hollered not to put our heads out of the window, that it was the soldiers shooting up the town. I was very much frightened. I heard one of the soldiers say, "Shoot him, the s— o— b—; there he goes; get him." I could hear the pumping of the guns like as if they were reloading. The effect which this shooting had upon the people was awful. There wasn't any ladies that would go on the streets until those niggers left there. They were frightened to death.

MISS MAYFIELD.—Reside at Brownsville, Tex. Was at Brownsville the night of the 13th. Was asleep in my room and was awakened by the shooting. It seemed to be in the direction of the barracks. Then it came from toward our house, then a volley was fired which went into the Cowen house. Then they went down the alley behind the hotel, shooting as they went. I was in the hall at this time. There is a window opening from the hall right into the alley. The window was open. I could hear the parties who were doing the shooting talking. I heard them say, "There he goes down Elizabeth street; shoot him." They used some profane language. It was certainly negroes' voices. I could distinguish their voices very easily. They were right under the window.

Mrs. COWEN.—Live in Brownsville, Tex.; have lived there every since I was about ten months old. I was in town the night of the 13th of August. My house is the corner of Fourteenth street and the alley—a small one-story frame building. There had been a children's party at my house that night. I think they had left about a quarter of an hour before the shooting. I was dressed sitting at the table when the shooting commenced. When I first heard the shots the children ran to me and called out "fire." They thought it was a fire. I thought the soldiers and the policemen had gotten into a clash. Mr. Cowen had gone out for lunch and I kept looking for him. When I heard them I told the children to get under the bed. They got under the bed. The Mexican servant girl went to the window and she saw the soldiers right at the alley fence, my alley fence. She saw them put a gun over the fence and blow out this lamp on the table. She was not 3 feet from it. She fell down and crawled into my room. Afterwards Mrs. Leahy, the lady across the street, called out to us and she said, "Shall we come over for you?" and I said, "I wish you would." We went back with them. There were twenty-three bullet holes found in our house.

AMBROSE LITTLEFIELD.—Age 26; had been deputy sheriff; was in Brownsville the night of August 13 at the Rio Grande Hotel. My mother and father were proprietors of the hotel. It is on Jefferson street between Eleventh and Twelfth. I had just dropped off to sleep when the shooting commenced. I put on my shoes and pants and hat and coat, and that was all. The shooting was in the direction of the post. I recognized them as high-power rifles. I went down Elizabeth street until I came to the alley between Washington and Elizabeth streets, and I turned down the alley toward the post. When I got middle way between Eleventh and Twelfth streets in the alley I seen a shot fired in front of me and I heard a number of others. I could see a crowd of people in the alley in front of me. I followed them as they went around the corner of the alley into Thirteenth street. I passed the Ruby Saloon and was probably 20 feet past the door of the Ruby Saloon. I stood there until the firing stopped and then went to the corner of the alley on Thirteenth street, and I saw a bunch of people runing diagonally across Washington and Thirteenth streets. I saw those people run across there, and as they were passing they passed in about 20 feet of the street lamp, and I recognized them as United States soldiers or people in the United States uniform. I was at the time at the mouth of the alley between Washington and Elizabeth streets. There was one of them that I distinctly recognized as being a colored soldier. As I was standing there and looking at them this one turned his head and looked back the way they had come from, and that turned his face directly toward me, and the light was shining directly in his face and I recognized him as a colored soldier at the time. There were about five to seven of them in the party. I had no doubt at the time about this being soldiers in uniform, and that this one man especially was a negro soldier.

I shall not take further time in discussing the direct testimony, because I want to call attention now to some of the circumstantial evidence which is found in the record. We ordinarily say that circumstantial evidence is less satisfactory than direct evidence, and ordinarily that is true; but the circumstantial evidence which is in this record, especially taken in connection with the direct evidence, points to but one conclusion.

In the first place, there were the bullets which were picked up on the premises or found in the different houses. These bullets were experted. It was found that they were Government bullets, and that they had been fired in either a Krag or a Springfield rifle. The only parties in that country who had Springfield rifles were the colored soldiers. After the experting of the bullets, we may take them and go out over the ground over which the raiders traveled, and we find the Springfield shell and the Springfield clip. We now have the circumstance of the bullets being Government bullets, of having been fired in one of two guns, one of those guns in the possession of the soldiers alone, and the shells scattered out over the ground over which the raiders traveled.

This becomes a very important fact, because here we have got to get the citizens' conspiracy into practical operation again. In order that this powerful and positive circumstantial evidence may be removed and the force and effect of it taken from the affair, it is necessary to show that the citizens' conspiracy did what? That they got hold of some Krag guns, that they stole these shells, that they fired these bullets, and then went over the ground and picked up the Krag shells and went back over the ground and planted Springfield shells.

Is there any other explanation than that? Yes. One other, and that is that the citizens' committee took these Krag rifles and went to a machine shop and had them reamed out, so that they could fire the other shells. I can imagine a blacksmith in Brownsville reaming out a Krag rifle so as to fire a Springfield rifle shell, and yet these are the impossible and the improbable things which you have got to explain as having been done by the citizens' conspiracy before you remove the direct evidence of the guilt of these men.

Again, another incident. These bullets were afterwards examined and found to contain lead, antimony, and tin. It was found that the Government contract with this company called for only lead and tin. Therefore the composition of the bullets seemed to be directly against the theory that the soldiers participated in the raid. But further investigation disclosed that back in 1905 the same company, in making its bullets, used lead, tin, and antimony; and that is proven beyond dispute in the record.

Then, going a step further, it is disclosed that a part of this ammunition which was manufactured under that contract, and which was an exceptional manufacture, was issued to Fort Niobrara and went to these soldiers. Nothing but a Divine revelation could be stronger evidence against these men than that.

It was not subject to be manufactured. It was not within the power of anybody in Brownsville to change it. It was beyond the reach of the citizens there. I submit that no explanation of that incident can be given which is not only consistent with, but is direct proof of, the guilt of these men. So we have the direct evidence of some fifteen or twenty witnesses, coming from all walks of life, all professions, and all trades, and these circumstantial facts going directly to the proof of the participation of these soldiers in the Brownsville raid.

Mr. President, to say that these guns were reamed out or that the citizens stole the shells might be sufficient before a jury to save a man's life, but I submit, in the interest of the great Army of the United States and its honor and the welfare of the home and the protection of the lives of the citizens, that it is not sufficient upon which to keep a man in the United States Army. We are not trying men for murder or imposing punishment for crime. We are to determine whether or not these facts are such as justify us, as was so well said by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], in untying this contract with the Government.

Passing on, I call attention now to the minor corroborative facts with reference to this affair:

1. Shells of cartridges picked up from B Company rifles.
2. Company B was the last to completely assemble.
3. Some of the men of Company B were completely dressed when they assembled.
4. Drinking in Company B that night. One was dead drunk.
5. A great deal of confusion and straggling in upon the part of Company B and getting into ranks.
6. Bullet holes in Randall's and Yturria's houses indicate the shots came from the second floor of or near B barracks.
7. Some four or five witnesses state they saw flashes from the second floor of B barracks.
8. Bullets taken from the houses were Government bullets.
9. The cartridges and clips and shells picked up on the streets were Government cartridges and shells.
10. The composition of the bullets correspond to the composition of the bullets made under contract of 1905 and ammunition issued to Twenty-fifth Infantry under that contract.
11. Bandolier was a Government bandolier.

I shall notice only briefly some of the features, with reference to the explanatory effect of this evidence, and will not detain much longer those who have honored me with their presence.

There is no defense interposed in this matter except a defense which is based upon the presumption that no noncommissioned officer participated in this affair. So far as I have been able to analyze the explanation of this testimony, there is no explanation other than that which departs when we get rid of the assumption that no noncommissioned officer participated. I say that for this reason: The questions of the roll call, of the gun racks, of the ammunition, of the cleaning of the guns, of the fourth gun, all disappear immediately if we do not act upon the assumption that no noncommissioned officer was interested, because if any noncommissioned officer was interested or participated in the affair these things were just as easily accomplished as anything else that is charged to the companies.

I want to call attention now to the statement of Major Penrose in support of what I say. Major Penrose says:

> They slipped out of quarters, did the shooting, returned while companies were forming, and at some time during the early hours of the morning cleaned their rifles. This is all made possible from the fact that the shooting all occurred within two short blocks of the barracks.

The questions of cleaning the rifles and of getting the ammunition and the gun racks and those matters are explained in a word by the commanding officer, who certainly is not a prejudiced judge as against these men. If a noncommissioned officer knew of this or connived at it, the soldiers had all the time, from the time they came back until the next morning, to take care of the question of gun racks and the cleaning of guns and the getting of ammunition beforehand, and could have done so as easily as if there had been no key to the gun rack at all.

Just one word in reference to the roll call. No officer of this company contends or has contended, so far as I have been able to find, that the question of the roll call cuts any figure with reference to the innocence of these men, for the reason, in the first place, that the roll call took place after the time when they had the time to return from the shooting to answer the roll call. They were 250 yards, at the farthest, from the place where the roll call was had. They had only 250 or 300 yards to travel. Witness Willie H. Miller, a colored boy, explains how easy it was to return. Miller says:

Native of Tennessee. Enlisted in Richmond, Va. Came off guard on Monday, the 13th, about 10 or 11 o'clock. I went on pass to Matamoros that day. My pass gave permission to be absent from 12 noon until 5 a. m. on the 14th of August, 1906. I was over in Matamoros on the 13th, in the afternoon. I returned from Matamoros that night about 10.30. When I returned I went to my cousin's, in Brownsville—Mack Hamilton. He had been in the Army. He lived two blocks from Elizabeth street. I was there until 11 o'clock. Then I went to a saloon—a Mexican saloon. When I was in the saloon some firing commenced in town, and he closed the door of the saloon until the firing had about ceased.

The firing stopped the game. The firing seemed like it was up the street toward the barracks. When the doors closed I was in there, and I talked to this Mexican, the proprietor of this place, and I showed him my pass and I says, "If anything ever comes of this, I want to show you this." He was talking and said he thought the soldiers were firing on the town, etc. I suppose I stayed there five or six minutes after the firing commenced. I stayed until after it ceased. Then I went to the quarters. I went in a hurry, but I did not run—I walked fast. I entered across the fence. My company was just falling in in front of the barracks. They told me to get my gun and join the company, and I got my gun. I did not have any gun that time (when I was in town). I went upstairs and got a gun and joined my company.

This man, who had been to Matamoros, stayed at the saloon till the firing ceased, then walked a block and a half farther than any other man had to walk, and got back there in time to answer and form with his company. Will it be contended that the men who realized what they had done, and who had planned evidently beforehand to get back, could not have made it in half the time that Miller made it and been back there in plenty of time to answer roll call?

I call attention to another matter in this affair. The record shows that—

Private Lee stayed the night at a house in the city. Was out that night. (S. Doc., p. 128.)

Private E. Johnson (p. 132) stayed that night in town with his wife.

Private G. Johnson (p. 120) was sleeping at the corral and knew nothing about the matter until he was told about it afterwards.

Private John Streater (p. 134) was asleep in the corral. Never knew anything about it.

Private G. Thomas (p. 117) was at a colored woman's house in Brownsville and did not return until the next morning.

Private Hardin (p. 131) was absent from the quarters sleeping at Lieutenant Higgins's quarters and did not appear until the next morning.

Private Turner (p. 135) was absent from the quarters sleeping at Lieutenant Hayes's.

Private Kirkpatrick (p. 133) was in the hospital.

Private John Brown (p. 151) was asleep in the baker shop.

Private Elmer Brown (p. 151) was asleep in the corral.

Private Newton (p. 140) was asleep in the quarters of Lieutenant West.

Private Jones (p. 139) was asleep in Captain Lyon's quarters.

Private Mapp (p. 141) was asleep in the bake shop.

Private Halley (p. 144) was asleep in the corral.

Private John Henry (p. 144) was in the quartermaster's corral.

Private Charles W. Hawkins (p. 140) was in town on a pass.

In addition to these absentees there were absent on duty within the post at the guardhouse four noncommissioned officers.

Private Miller was out on a pass.

Major Penrose said they reported to him two men absent.

The record shows that on this occasion there were several absent who did not get home until next morning, and it further shows that there were a number of them who were so sound asleep in different parts of the garrison that they never did discover the fact until some of their comrades went down and told them about it.

I mistrust it is barely possible that there was a reason for their not discovering that fact, and that was that they thought it would place them too near to that which they knew they were guilty of.

A suggestion with reference to the question of the fourth gun. The question of the fourth gun depends alone at last, when it is boiled down, upon the oral statement of McCurdy. There are other circumstances which have been construed to support that proposition, and I will admit they seem to, but when you come to examine the record in all its parts, you will find that there is no identification of the gun so as to establish the fact that it was not used that night except the oral statement of McCurdy. There is no other way by which it can be identified and shown not to have been used; and if it should be believed possible that McCurdy, like the sergeant at Sturgis City, Dak., let loose of the key that night when the Twenty-fifth Infantry was involved in another raid of this kind, it would be very easy to explain where the fourth gun was.

All they had to do in this matter was simply to pass the key to the parties who desired to participate in this raid, and when you have the fact of the bullets, the analysis and composition of the bullets, the shells found upon the street, we must come to the conclusion at once that some one who was identified with the noncommissioned force was cognizant of this raid. That is one of the reasons why it is a necessary conclusion from the evidence in this case that not only were there those who participated, but those who must inevitably have known something of it who did not actually participate in it.

When this matter is boiled down to what the record actually shows, whether or not McCurdy's gun was used that night depends upon the oral statement of McCurdy.

McCurdy claims that the racks were never open, and yet any fair interpretation of his somewhat inconsistent testimony shows that Alison's gun was placed in the rack after August 11.

Blaney testified that he cleaned his rifle prior to turning it over both at Fort Niobrara and at El Reno, and yet when rifle 45683 was received at the Springfield Armory it had a foul bore, showing that it had been used some time and not properly cleaned. This was likely the hurried cleaning which it got that night.

The above is either correct or else Sergeant Blaney was mistaken as to cleaning the rifle, or the property book is in error as to the serial number which Blaney held either at Fort Niobrara or at El Reno.

The evidence is that the serial numbers of the rifles stored in the box were not checked; hence the evidence that any particular rifle was in said box was not conclusive.

Lieutenant Lawrason, upon whose testimony the presence of the rifle 45683 largely depends, states that he was not present when said box was packed at Fort Niobrara.

Sergeant Blaney, who is supposed to have had rifle 45683, left Fort Niobrara on his furlough June 8. Lieutenant Lawrason did not assume command of Company B until July 1 thereafter, hence he was not in command of Company B when Sergeant Blaney went on his furlough and turned his rifle over at Fort Niobrara.

When, on the morning of August 14, Lieutenant Lawrason verified the rifles of Company B he did not verify them by serial numbers, but by their total numbers, taking only one or two rifles out of the boxes; hence there is no evidence that 45683 was actually in one of those boxes at the time.

Lieutenant Lawrason was not certain that the boxes of rifles had not been opened since they were packed at Fort Niobrara.

The evidence does not show that the rifles issued to the men of Company B were ever checked by their serial numbers with the men to whom assigned since they were issued about April 1, 1906; hence there were about four months at Fort Niobrara and two weeks at Fort Brownsville during which time the rifles of the company may have been exchanged inadvertently or purposely without the records of transfers having been entered in the property book. That such transfers were not unfrequent may be gathered easily from the evidence.

The ordnance property book was carelessly kept, as admitted by Lieutenant Lawrason and also as shown by the statement of irregularities in the keeping of this book.

It is also shown by the evidence that rifles are exchanged in order to allow a good marksman to get a good rifle.

Now, Mr. President, I have gone over some of the evidence which discloses, to my mind, beyond a reasonable doubt, that some of the soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry participated in that raid. If they were guilty at all, they were guilty of murder thought upon and planned and deliberately executed.

There can be no doubt that it is a serious question—that of disturbing a soldier in his relationship to the Government—but there can be no more serious question than that of keeping the United States Army free from the cancerous growth of the disturbances which prevail in more than one part of this country.

To my mind this was treason, not technically so, but morally aggravated treason. In these times, when a spirit of lawlessness pervades a certain part of the social realm, when a social organization, or professing to be one, preaches lawlessness as one of the tenets of its faith, to find this spirit of lawlessness in the Army is shocking beyond the power of words to tell.

Finding it there so close to the vital forces of the nation, what was the duty of those upon whom it devolved to act? Strike it down, enforce the judgment of the Government in such a way as to instill both dread and respect in those who lightly toy with human life and thus degrade the standing of the Army.

It should be known to these people, the same as it is known to all of us, the colored race and the white race, that this is a Government of law and of order. If the disturbers and raiders and dynamiters throughout this country think that the American people as a whole will connive at the violation of law, they misunderstand the instinct and the inspiration of the Anglo-Saxon race.

The negroes have helped to build up this country. Their labors in slavery and out of slavery have helped to build it, and their valor has helped to preserve it. No man would take from the colored race of this country one iota of praise or honor for the heroic climb which it has made from slavery to its respectable position in the civilization of the world.

But no leader of the colored race ever did a greater injury to the thousands of colored men who are struggling up to the high plane of civilization than to teach them that their Government will connive at a breach of the law. For one and all, white race and black race, there is but one rule, which is that when the rights of the American citizen are involved, the peace of the home and the protection of life, party politics disappear and American citizenship is the only chord which will receive a responsive strain from the American people. I can not imagine a more cowardly act, a more pusillanimous act upon the part of a great party than to undertake to connive at a crime so thoroughly proved as this because of anticipated political exigencies. It is our duty to say to the people of this country that the party which gave the colored man his freedom will also teach him that this Government can only be preserved by observing the law and observing the rights of citizens in their homes. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILD LABOR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. KEAN. Let us proceed with the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first bill on the Calendar will be announced.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4812) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia.

Mr. NELSON. Let the bill be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over, without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from Minnesota.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

The bill (H. R. 15372) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker acts, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. I hope to call up that bill in a few days and make it the unfinished business of the Senate. I ask that it may go over to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

NATIONAL FORESTS.

The bill (S. 4825) for acquiring national forests in the Southern Appalachian Mountains and White Mountains was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On page 1, line 1, after the words "Secretary of Agriculture," I move to insert the words:

For the purpose of preserving the navigability of navigable streams.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On page 4, at the end of section 6, I move to strike out the period and to add the words:

For the purpose of preserving the navigability of navigable streams.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I send to the desk and ask to have read a memorial of the Association for the Protection of the Adirondack Mountains in behalf of the pending bill.

RECLAMATION OF SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4855) appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States to the construction of works for the drainage or reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands belonging to the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], to strike out sections 5 and 6 of the bill. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there are no further amendments——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think in the confusion incident to the closing of the speech of the Senator from Idaho, the Senate is not really informed as to what is before it. I should like to have the attention of the Senate to the particular measure. Let the title of the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the title of the pending bill.

The Secretary again read the title of the bill.

Mr. CLAY. If I understand the bill now, since sections 5 and 6 have been stricken out, it simply provides that the money arising from the proceeds of public lands hereafter sold and the proceeds from the lands sold since June 1, 1901, shall be applied to the drainage of swamp land belonging to the Government. In other words, the funds arising from the sale of the public lands will hereafter be applied to the draining of swamp land in the States where the Government lands may be located; and, in addition to that, the bill appropriates the sum of about $5,000,000 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act.

Mr. FLINT. The Senator states the bill correctly.

Mr. TELLER. I understand then it leaves simply the proposition that the Government may drain its own lands. Is that correct?

Mr. FLINT. That is correct, as the bill now stands.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I expected to make some remarks on the other feature of the bill. I do not care about going on if that is the way the bill stands now.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments will be considered in gross. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I dislike to appear to be importunate about this matter, but I think it is a very unwise proposition, and I therefore move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes have it.

Mr. BACON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison	Depew	Hale	Overman
Bacon	Dick	Heyburn	Paynter
Brandegee	Dixon	Johnston	Perkins
Brown	Dolliver	Kean	Piles
Bulkeley	Elkins	Knox	Rayner
Burkett	Flint	Lodge	Richardson
Burrows	Foraker	Long	Scott
Clapp	Foster	McCreary	Smith, Mich.
Clay	Frazier	McCumber	Smoot
Culberson	Gamble	Money	Stone
Curtis	Gary	Nelson	Teller
Daniel	Gore	Nixon	Warner

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I report back with sundry amendments, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, the bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 552) thereon. I shall try to call up the bill to-morrow morning for the action of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

RECLAMATION OF SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LANDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4855) appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States to the construction of works for the drainage or reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands belonging to the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to what I think is a serious defect in the bill. Section 4 of the bill provides—

That the Secretary of the Interior shall make appropriate provisions for limiting the area to be taken by homestead entrymen under this act for ceded Indian or other lands to areas not less than 5 acres nor more than a quarter section.

That does not limit the area, I understand, to the Indian grounds, but it applies to "ceded Indian or other lands." I move to strike out the words "or other" before "lands."

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Colorado pardon me for a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. The words "or other lands" were inserted upon the theory that the Government would have lands to drain other than those which might be to-day classed as ceded and Indian lands. I have no objection to striking out those words.

Mr. TELLER. My objection is that we are authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to determine what a homestead shall be when Congress has determined for a great many years that it shall be 160 acres. There is no limit here. The reclamation act does provide for some control over the area and fixes the smallest area of land that can be used and made into a homestead at 80 acres. If this were amended so that it would be 80 acres instead of the present language, I should not have any objection to it. As it stands it might be 1 acre or 5 acres. I want to confine the limitation of a homestead to Indian lands alone.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that the better way to meet that would be to change the limitation and make it 80 acres, if the Senator prefers.

Mr. TELLER. That might be too much Indian land, perhaps.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not know that it would be. If those words were stricken out, it would then confine it entirely to lands which to-day would be classed, perhaps, as ceded Indian lands, instead of the general public domain.

Mr. TELLER. I will venture my hand at an amendment to the bill by striking out the word "five" and inserting "not less than 40 acres, nor more than 80 acres."

Mr. FLINT. I will accept the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado proposes an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the word "five" and insert "not less than forty nor more than eighty"——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I will suggest, for the benefit of the Secretary, that what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] desires is to strike out "five" and insert "forty," on line 4; and then to strike out, on line 5, the words "a quarter section" and to insert "80 acres," so that it would read:

Areas not less than 40 acres, nor more than 80 acres.

Mr. TELLER. That will do it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, on page 4, line 4, it is proposed to strike out "five" and insert "forty;" and in line 5 to strike out the words "a quarter section" and to insert "80 acres," so that it will read:

Not less than 40 acres, nor more than 80 acres.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the other day when this bill was under consideration there was some question about the reclamation act, and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] made a statement which I did not think was borne out by the act. I now have the act before me, and I find that the only authority which the Government has for taking private property into this reclamation scheme is contained in section 6 and section 8 of that act. Section 6 provides that the Government shall not sell to private owners of land more than the water for 160 acres. It is also provided in section 7:

That where, in carrying out the provisions of this act, it becomes necessary to acquire any rights or property, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to acquire the same for the United States by purchase or by condemnation under judicial process, and to pay from the reclamation fund the sums which may be needed for that purpose.

Mr. President, when the reclamation act was passed nobody concerned in its consideration had any idea that the Government was going to buy land from private citizens to reclaim it. We then believed that that should be done by the private citizen. I now understand that the Government is, I think without any authority of law, making arrangements to acquire and put into the reclamation scheme lands in private ownership.

Mr. President, I do not think that that is justified by the law. I think section 7 was intended to mean that when it was necessary to build a reservoir and some land in private ownership was included in the reservoir site the Government might acquire such land. That was at least the construction originally put upon the act by the Department, but lately, I understand, they have gone beyond that, which only shows that when we are enacting laws we have got to enact them with a good deal of exactness or a construction may be put upon them by the executive department which is entirely different from what the legislative department of the Government intended.

Mr. President, I do not myself feel very much interest in this bill. I do not believe there is any such demand or necessity for it as there was for the inauguration of reclamation service. Practically all swamp land, with very small exceptions, is the property of the States and might be utilized by the States by drainage. I will not deny that the Government has the same authority under the law, when the proper necessity arises, for draining land as it has for irrigating land; but I must say that I have not yet seen a case that seemed to me to justify Government interference for the purpose of draining land.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. MCCUMBER. Let the amendment be again stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill. The Secretary will call the roll, on agreeing to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. He not being present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. As he is absent from the Chamber, I will transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. He does not appear to be present, and I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is detained from the Chamber by illness. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE]. As he is absent, and I do not know how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DANIEL. I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MONEY. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. MCLAURIN] is necessarily absent on business.

Mr. DAVIS. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON]. I desire to transfer that pair to the Senator from Florida [Mr. MILTON], so as to be able to vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas, 15, nays 37, as follows:

So Mr. BACON'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 21, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 20, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following report from the Committee on Rules:

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, before that I desire to be recognized for a question of privilege.

Mr. DALZELL. This is a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] rise to a question of privilege or personal privilege?

Mr. WILLIAMS. A question of the privilege of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] rises to a question of privilege of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I find Rule IX——

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman a resolution?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not easily susceptible of a resolution. It is a question concerning the privilege of the House under Rule IX, which I will read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that a question of the privilege of the House invariably requires a resolution. A question of personal privilege does not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to intrude unnecessarily now upon the time of the Chair. If the Chair will permit me to state the question, I think the Chair will agree with me it is almost impossible to put it specifically in the shape of a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can proceed by unanimous consent without a resolution, but under the rules the question of the privilege of the House, in the opinion of the Chair, requires a resolution. A question of personal privilege to the Member does not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Chair decline to let me state what the question of privilege, in my opinion, is before arguing?

The SPEAKER. The Chair makes no objection. By unanimous consent the gentleman could proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The power of recognition is within the discretion of the Chair. If the Chair will recognize me to state——

The SPEAKER. Not on a question of privilege of the House. That is a question of the highest privilege, and under the rules requires a resolution; but I apprehend that the House will make no objection, and the Chair will submit it. Is there objection to the gentleman——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, how much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, I suppose about fifteen minutes—ten or fifteen.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] may have fifteen minutes in which to state his question of privilege.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. It seems to me that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], in view of his refusal to let anybody have unanimous consent who desired it, should himself ask it. I shall object, myself, unless the request is made by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], I very reluctantly withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi for fifteen minutes to present a question of the privilege of the House without introducing a resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to read from the RECORD of Saturday, April 18. On page 4947 of the RECORD I find this entry:

> Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.
> The question was taken.
> The SPEAKER. The ayes have it——
> Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Speaker.
> The SPEAKER (continuing). And the House stands adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The Speaker will note that the usual form of putting the question, "The ayes seem to have it, the ayes have it," which is done for the purpose of enabling anyone in opposition to call for a division, was omitted. The Speaker will also note that before the Speaker had announced the conclusion, with his statement that "The House stands adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock," the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] called for a division, a call evidently heard by the Speaker; from all of which two facts will appear: First, that nobody on the floor or from the chair made the point of order that the call for a division was dilatory; secondly, that the Speaker himself, being a Member of the House, with the power to do that, to wit, to make the point by announcing a purpose not to entertain the motion because dilatory, whatever may be said of the goodness or badness of the practice of making of himself at once objector and judge, did not himself make the point in a manner in which he could have made it, by saying to the House, "The Chair regards the call for a division as dilatory, and therefore refuses to entertain it," upon which announcement by the Chair the House or any Member thereof could have controlled subsequent conduct accordingly. The Speaker made no ruling whatsoever.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in all due, cool, unimpassioned manner, I desire to say a few words concerning this incident, involving as it does, in my opinion, a grave and dangerous breach of the privileges of the House under Rule IX, which reads:

> Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings.

Now, Mr. Speaker, of course I can make due allowance for what the darkies would call in Mississippi the degree of "pestering" that I have inflicted upon the Chair for some time, which I have been pursuing with a view of bringing about a result which I thought could be brought about best in that way, if at all. Making all allowance for human nature which, becoming intolerant of opposition and "pestering" in that way, might override what has been the historical usage, I want to state now that if I am right about this matter, and I think I am, it is one of the gravest things that has occurred in the parliamentary history of the United States; and with a view to getting it exactly right, or as nearly as possible, and in order to keep my statement of it cool and collected and unimpassioned, a little before I came up this morning I sketched in lead pencil what I thought ought to be presented to the House.

I have, upon second thought, a resolution here which, when I sit down, I shall offer; I have dictated its substance to a friend who is writing it, and will offer it then.

My statement of the breach of privilege is as follows: Mr. Speaker, all talk about a breach in the personal friendship existing between the Speaker and me, growing out of what I regard as his Saturday evening's arbitrary adjournment of the House, is nonsense. Real friendships in this world are too hard to form and to maintain and too precious after they are formed to be lightly shaken off by sensible men. This is a totally different proposition, however, from voluntarily becoming a party to the treatment as a jest of so grave an attack upon the form and spirit of representative government as the Speaker's action or act upon the closing of the legislative day of Monday, April 6, or the calendar day of Saturday last constituted. I say action or act, and not ruling; because if it had been based upon an open and announced ruling by the Speaker, even if made on his own initiative, it would have been different. That would have been within his power if not within his technical right, whatever we may think of the danger of the practice. I do not deny that if any Member had risen in his place and made the point of order that my call for a division was dilatory the Speaker could, under the discretion vested in him by the rules of the House, have sustained the point of order made and announced his ruling, which, without successful appeal, would have bound me and the other Members of the House. I do not deny, further, that under our peculiar rules the Speaker could, the point of order being made and an appeal having been taken, have ruled the appeal itself out of order as dilatory.

Again, I do not deny that the Speaker himself—and I ask the Speaker's attention to this part of it—being a Member of the House, could make the point of order himself by simply announcing from the desk that "The Speaker regards the call for a division as dilatory, and therefore refuses to entertain it." That the Speaker has a right to make a ruling, as Speaker, on a point of order suggested by himself as a Member is one thing; that he has a right to act sub silentio without a ruling, and without giving to the House the opportunity that such an announced ruling would have given to correct it, or for the subsequent exercise of the constitutional right of one-fifth of the House to secure a roll call, is another thing. That the Speaker's action was taken with this very view of ultimately preventing a roll call is undeniable. It is undenied by him in his interview which he has given to the papers in connection with the matter. It is a fact too plain to need assertion. It will remain, I know, undenied by him, because he is a perfectly truthful man.

Thus far he has, in his interview referred to by me, uttered no word of denial, but this is his statement:

THE SPEAKER'S POSITION.

The Constitution does provide that on demand of one-fifth of the Members present the yeas and nays shall be spread upon the Journal. Representative WILLIAMS did not demand the yeas and nays, nor did any other Member of the House. As he did not choose to exercise his right under the Constitution, the Chair ignored his dilatory demand for a division and declared the House adjourned. The bare statement of the proceedings shows that Representative WILLIAMS did not know how to avail himself of his constitutional rights or did not choose to do so.

The Speaker, as a Member of the House, though it may be bad practice, has the power to make a point of order himself and to sustain his own point of order under our rules. This is a sad fact, but his right to make a point of order, even though accompanied by the power to sustain it, stands on the same footing as that of any other Member, and on no higher footing than that of any other Member. It must be openly made and openly sustained. There must be an open ruling within the hearing and the view of the House. What would be thought, for example, if, on a paragraph upon a general appropriation bill, it being new legislation, the Speaker were simply to erase it from the bill, or order the Clerk to pass it over in the reading of the bill; or if, on an amendment offered from the floor, obnoxious to the same rule as new legislation upon a general appropriation bill, the Speaker were simply to pass it over—"ignore it," to use the Speaker's own phrase in his printed interview—without announcing why, so as thereby to put the House in possession of his reasons, and give it, or any Member of it, an opportunity to regulate his subsequent conduct accordingly? How could the House control or overrule the Speaker? There would be no ruling to question, but simply a fait accompli to digest. The rules do not provide, Mr. Speaker, that the Speaker may "ignore" a motion or demand as dilatory, but that he may rule it out of order; or, to use the language of the rule, may "refuse to entertain it," announcing that fact to the House—making a ruling whereby he refuses.

Nobody not foolish or else laboring under great temporary excitement can fail to see the difference between the two things. The first is a mere arbitrary act with an unannounced motive, in foro conscientiæ, and as it is unheard and unseen by and unknown to the House, and hence uncontrollable by it, even if every Member of the House save the Speaker differed in opinion with him; the latter, to wit, an announcement that the Chair refuses to entertain, because the motion is in violation of order as being dilatory, or for any other reason, is an official decision of the Chair, controllable or reviewable by the House, and leaving moreover other parliamentary rights upon its announcement, or in consequence of its announcement, or held in abeyance until its announcement, intact and whole. The Speaker I think can not and will not deny that it was his real intent and purpose to cut off the right to demand the yeas and nays, and that that was the reason why he did not make an open ruling, even upon his own initiative, as he might have done if he had chosen to do so, but instead resorted to this unprecedented parliamentary device of ignoring, sub silentio, an ordinarily proper demand—never becoming improper save and until when ruled to be so—and then explaining subsequently through the newspapers, and after adjournment had been declared by him, when there was no House to appeal to or to which to explain his purpose, which was undoubted and is undenied, until it had been accomplished and was past recall or review.

The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that you are one of the best men in the world; but a long and undisturbed power, whose lesser abuses have been good-naturedly passed over and tolerated, has made you somewhat despotic and too intolerant of opposition. For some moons both the Members of the House and of the press gallery have noticed that you frequently make a jest of performing the solemn official act of counting those standing on a division, and I think that in this case of Saturday last you thought that the matter would be treated trivially and lightly as a jest, exciting no serious comment. It was an act, or I will say conduct—not a ruling, I repeat—the motive, purpose, and effect of which was, by an unprecedented, unexpected, and unannounced internal ruling—if that may be called "ruling" which ruling was none, for there can be no ruling save an announced ruling—to destroy the very essence of representative government by annihilating the constitutionally guaranteed right of one-fifth of the Members of this House to place themselves and others on record in all cases. The Speaker knew that if he had said "The Chair refuses to entertain the demand because it is dilatory," I would have replied, as was my right, "Then, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays." It was because he knew this that he acted without a ruling, in violation of his own rules—because it is not too strong a statement to call these rules the Speaker's own rules—and afterwards in the newspapers promulgated this startling doctrine of a right, without a ruling, to ignore a demand for a division. To ignore a demand for a division, without announcing why, will be followed as the next logical step by the assertion of a right to ignore a motion without announcing why. Where will it stop? This is totally different from the power or the technical right of the Chair to refuse to entertain a motion and refuse to put it to the House, announcing to the House that he so refuses because it is violative of the rules of the House by being dilatory or otherwise.

The Speaker in his interview says that I did not call for the yeas and nays and that I either was ignorant of my right to call for the yeas and nays or else chose not to exercise it. Mr. Speaker, I dare say that in your cooler moments you do not believe for one moment that I was either ignorant of the fact that I had a right to call for the yeas and nays or that I chose not to exercise it. The one statement is a non sequiter of the other. I had a right to call for a division first, and I had a right to have that call either heeded by being executed or else ruled out of order, neither of which courses was pursued by the Speaker. In either case the call for the yeas and nays, held rightfully by me in reserve, would have followed. The Speaker knew this. It had been my uniform course for two or three weeks, and he never thought previously of cutting off that right by the newborn doctrine of ignoring it without a ruling until Saturday.

Mr. Speaker, human nature is human nature. You and I have our full measure of it. In intolerance of opposition bred by power you then resorted to this summary, arbitrary, unprecedented, and dangerous procedure. At heart a fair man, in my opinion you will, before the close of the session, in some way say that you have been hurried on the Saturday's occasion by my nagging, or whatever you choose to call it, beyond the bounds of orderly procedure.

I saw the other day a cartoon of "The Speaker sitting down on the minority." But when the Speaker arose, evidently excitedly, from his seat, each head of the minority was in the shape of a small tack, which evidently had been worrying the Speaker, and the tacks constitute a calumny upon us by being named "JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS and minority." The Speaker will find that the sort of sitting down on the minority tried on Saturday will hurt him more than us.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this desire to "sit down on the minority" may have had something to do with it. You and I love humor. I love it a bit too much, I am free to say, but let neither of us love it so much as to try to make a jest of sacred rights and duties. I believe before the close of the session you will come to the conclusion yourself that this brand-new precedent will be "honored more in the breach than in the observance."

My best excuse for carrying this matter thus far is that. The fact of the Speaker's being carefully interviewed in the newspapers demonstrates that it has finally dawned on him as a grave question and one to be gravely considered by the House and by the country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed twenty minutes, but, without objection, he will proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to proceed, Mr. Speaker, except to send up a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives in adjourning the House on Saturday, April 18, 1908, was a breach of the privileges of the House affecting its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that resolution does not present any question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the resolution is privileged.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair craves the indulgence of the House for a few moments. The rules of the House are to be observed under normal conditions, and the exceptions to normal conditions are contained in the rules themselves. In the recollection of the Chair since the present Speaker has occupied it, respect has been paid to the Constitution and to the rules framed under it. One rule of the House is as follows:

No dilatory motion shall be entertained by the Speaker.

What is the condition under which the Speaker acted in declaring that the motion to adjourn had prevailed? For two weeks past—it is an open secret, time and again avowed by the gentleman who leads the minority—he was resorting to dilatory proceedings for the purpose, as it seemed to him justifiable, to emphasize, as he claimed positions aliunde matters that were pending at the time touching general legislation.

The gentleman shortly before the motion to adjourn was made again avowed that intention and sought to justify his action. It is not for the Chair to condemn the action of any Member. All Members are equal, including the occupant of the chair, in their constitutional rights and in their rights under the rules. The Chair is a Member of the House as well as Speaker, and therefore exercises his right as a Member.

The Constitution of the United States, which governs all rules and all proceedings, the fixed law of the land that we can not violate with propriety and without rendering ourselves subject to the most severe condemnation, not only of the House, but of the country, is as follows:

Each House shall keep a Journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy, and the yeas and nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal.

The rules as framed under the Constitution, and there would be power to frame them even if the Constitution did not grant that right, are to be taken as a whole. The gentleman, proceeding in a dilatory way, when the Chair announced that the motion to adjourn prevailed did demand a division. The RECORD correctly states what happened, as read by the gentleman from Mississippi. The Chair heard the gentleman. The Chair knew of the constitutional provision. The gentleman from Mississippi knew of the constitutional provision, but as the gentleman proceeded, as he had for two weeks and many times upon that day and just before the motion to adjourn to exercise his power for dilatory proceedings, again resorted to dilatory proceedings, and the Chair watched carefully to see if he invoked the constitutional right which he had to demand the yeas and nays, and as the gentleman did not, and as no other Member demanded the yeas and nays, the Chair, as Speaker and as Member, after a long session of the House, after a vote was taken viva voce upon the motion to adjourn and there was an overwhelming majority voting in favor of adjourning, at the hour of nearly half past 6 o'clock, after a seven-hour session, the Chair held it to be not only his privilege, but his duty to sweep aside a merely dilatory demand and to declare the House adjourned. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] will please take the chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is usual to allow the proponent of a resolution——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi can only speak by consent of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The whole thing has been going on that way. It is usual to allow the proponent of a resolution to conclude the debate.

Mr. DALZELL took the chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Chair rule I have not that right now?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The gentleman from New York moves to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A division is demanded. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The House again divided, and there were—ayes 121, noes 79.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully demand the tellers.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that demand is dilatory, in view of the overwhelming vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Chair rule upon it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote is 121 yeas to 79 nays, and the Chair thinks the request is dilatory.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 148, nays 119, answered "present" 13, not voting 107, as follows:

The name of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] was called and he answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to report the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution 341.

Resolved, That during the remainder of this session Rule XXVIII shall be, and hereby is, modified in the following particulars:

First. The use of the motion shall not be restricted to the first and third Mondays of the month.

Second. The vote on agreeing to the motion shall in all cases be by majority instead of by two-thirds; and upon the demand of any Member opposed to the motion a second shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to me that under the circumstances there ought to be forty minutes of the time of the House exhausted in discussion of this rule. I do not wish, however, to seem to be discourteous to my colleagues on the Committee on Rules, and I therefore will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], if they see fit to accept of it, and will consume only a corresponding amount of time on our side.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the gentleman to yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] first.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] five minutes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, when a rule was adopted by this House not long since I took occasion to remark that the adoption of that rule would show the ability of the majority to do precisely what it chooses to do, and that the failure to do anything would be due to the fact that the majority wills not to do it. This rule no doubt will be adopted and will emphasize the force of what I then asserted. When this session shall have closed, and the time for accountability shall have come, there need be no doubt upon the proposition that just what the majority of this House chooses to do the majority of this House will have done. Neither will there be room for doubt upon the other proposition, that that which is not done is precisely that which this House by its majority decided not to do.

Now, these rules are far-reaching and comprehensive, and a great deal might be said against the adoption of them, against the departure from the ordinary course of proceeding. In one sense, however, while opposed to these rules and believing they ought not to be adopted, I will say I do not seriously regret their adoption, because every one is a fresh demonstration of the responsibility of the majority in the House. Many things that ought to have been done ere this have not been done, and many things that ought to be done before adjournment will not be done; but the responsibility of the majority for the neglect and the refusal will be so clear that no man need be confused about it, and so thoroughly demonstrated that no man can doubt it. At least the record will be clearly made up. What you will have done, if creditable, you will claim and you will get credit for doing; what you will have failed to do of the many things that ought to be done you certainly will be condemned for not doing; and there will be no way of escaping a just measure of condemnation. Under this rule, anything that you choose to put to a vote can be put to a vote, and a majority can carry it; and it can be done at any time from the hour of the adoption of this resolution until the hour of adjournment.

Now, then, when the question is asked, as it will be asked, why was not this done, why was not that done, the answer will be as clear as sunlight—because the Republican party willed that it should not be done. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] That philosophy may be applied in bulk, and it may be applied distinctly to any particular measure to which the people of this country choose to apply it; respecting any measure pending, in any state of progress—upon the Calendar, or in committee—that test may be applied, and it will work precisely and surely. Why was not this measure upon the Calendar put to a vote—because the Republican party would not permit a vote upon it. Why was not that measure, smothered in committee, put to a vote in the House upon a proposition to suspend the rules and pass it—because the Republican majority would not permit a vote to be taken by the House upon it.

Now, that record will be so clear and distinct that if the people err in their conclusions and decision concerning it, the fault will be their own, not yours. For once at least, and when the next campaign opens, we shall have clearly and distinctly before the people the fact that you are responsible, and you alone, for the failure to pass any measure and every measure not passed; and you and you alone will be held responsible for the failure to submit to a vote any particular measure introduced in this House, whether upon its Calendar or before any one of its committees. Aye, more; if you permit it, any Member of this House may bring before the House, at any time from the moment of the passage of this resolution until the adjournment at the close of this session, any measure whatsoever; because if the Speaker will recognize a Member, he can move to suspend the rules and pass any measure pending or not pending. No two-thirds vote will be required, but a mere majority will suffice.

The trouble about getting wholesome legislation lies in the denial of the privilege and right of having a vote upon wholesome measures. Now, then, when a vote is denied upon a measure, whether it be done affirmatively or negatively, by refusal of the Speaker to recognize a Member, or by some other process of repression, the majority will have willed that there shall be no vote upon that proposition. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] said he thought we could ill afford to lose forty minutes in the discussion of this rule—twenty minutes on a side—time is so exceedingly precious, Mr. Speaker. That is a part of the scheme to make the country believe that the course which has been pursued by the minority in attempting to focus the attention of the country and to procure certain legislation desired by it and the President has resulted in hindering and delaying the public business. The facts absolutely contradict that insinuation. The House was never so far ahead, in my recollection, in the consideration and disposition of the great supply bills as it is right now. Our course is simply to send to the country with each call of this House a message saying, "We call the roll again unnecessarily, in so far as the particular question being voted on is concerned, in order that you may know that a Republican majority, with legislative power to do anything it pleases, has as yet done nothing along the lines to which we called the attention of the country, and to which the President also called attention in his messages."

Mr. Speaker, if this rule is adopted, then you, as Speaker, will have no further excuse before the country; because if this rule is adopted, then there is absolutely nothing standing between the Speaker's will and consideration of legislation. He can recognize the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] or the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN] to-morrow to move to discharge the Ways and Means Committee from the further consideration of their respective bills to put wood pulp and print paper upon the free list and put them upon their passage through the House without power of amendment, under a suspension of the rules. Thus also with a campaign contributions publicity bill—all that is wanted is the Speaker's nod of recognition and a motion from the man recognized by him to suspend the rules.

Mr. Speaker, we have not been delaying the public business. The supply bills and the public business are further ahead than usual. Our course hurries up legislation and prevents waste of time in useless talk and adjournments. But I want to examine this particular rule. I want to show you what a farce it is.

It provides that—

Upon the demand of any Member opposed to the motion a second shall be considered as ordered.

Now, what is a second? Let us read its definition in the rules:

All motions to suspend the rules—

Says clause 2 of Rule XXVIII—shall before being submitted to the House be seconded by a majority by tellers if demanded.

What is the reason of the rule? It is to avoid going through the loss of time incident to trying to get two-thirds majority for a proposition when even a majority can not be obtained for its consideration. And yet the special rule now proposed provides that a majority of the House shall be considered as having seconded the rule whenever a second is demanded!

That is not all, Mr. Speaker. What a farcical thing all this is. The Speaker has the power to declare a second itself to be dilatory. Aye, according to the action of the Speaker upon Saturday last, just approved under the whip and spur of the party lash, by a majority upon that side of the House, he has a right, without the point of order being made by anyone and without any open announcement of his purpose to the House, without even saying from his seat in the chair that "The Chair will not entertain the demand for a second because it is dilatory," simply to ignore it and pass along to "sweep it away," as he expressed himself this morning in his reply to my argument; to "sweep it away," to "ignore" it, and to explain why later and when too late for any error of his to be corrected. We have finally gotten to the point where the procedures of this House lie within the secret conscience of the Speaker. There is no duty any more for him to communicate his reasons, his motives, or his rulings to the House. He can make a so-called ruling and submit it to the chancel of God, and then pass upon it himself, without even submitting it to an appeal to God in this world, whatever may be the case in the next, much less any control from the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] want to occupy some time?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will take two or three minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] was rather happier to-day than upon the other day, in omitting all reference to the Constitution. I do not know whether that omission was caused by my suggesting to the gentleman the other day that there were times when the Democratic party had not been so scrupulous about the Constitution as they are now.

The gentleman from Missouri, in his opening sentences, correctly stated the situation as it is to-day. He stated that when this rule was adopted the Republican majority would be responsible for everything done and not done. I tried to make clear the other day, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat now, that the Republican majority is anxious that the country should know that we are responsible for both what is and what is not done. I tried to make it clear the other day that the Republican party in this House, as well as the Republican party in the nation, in distinct contrast to our Democratic friends on most occasions, is not seeking to avoid responsibility, but accepts full responsibility for all that is done, as well as for all that is not done.

For, sir, both what is done and what is not done is actuated solely by our desire to do that which will best serve the interests of the greatest number of all the people of our beloved country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one word in reference to the rule which the gentleman from Mississippi has spoken of, and one word in reference to the gentleman's criticism of the Speaker. Mr. Speaker, section 10 of Rule XVI says, "No dilatory motion shall be entertained by the Speaker." It is an absolute prohibition on the Speaker's recognizing anybody for a motion which he considers dilatory, just as much a prohibition against his action as is the constitutional provision that he must recognize a demand for the yeas and nays. It is incumbent on the Speaker. He does not have to make a ruling; here is a direct demand from the Members of the House, who are the masters of the Speaker, from the majority of the House, regularly enacted by them——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield to a brief interruption?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; if it is brief.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the gentleman recognize the difference between refusing to entertain a motion and ignoring it without refusing?

Mr. SHERMAN. I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that here is a rule, adopted by this House, which tells the Speaker what he can not do, and I concede it to be the duty of the Speaker when the rule is there to obey it, and fail to recognize anybody who makes a motion which in the judgment of the Chair is purely dilatory. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I infer from the remarks made by the gentleman from Mississippi that he is in favor of the rule, inasmuch as it will enable the Republican majority in the House to do all the things they want to do—not all the things the gentleman from Mississippi, however, desires to have done. If what the gentleman from Mississippi says with respect to the progress of the business in this House is true, then two things have been illustrated: First, the utter futility of the filibuster on the Democratic side of the House, and, secondly, the power of the majority under the rules of the House to pass just such legislation as it sees fit to pass.

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the rules that have heretofore been introduced, and the rule that is now introduced, are intended to enable the House to do business in the normal way, not to introduce anything that is deleterious to the minority, not anything that will do injustice to the minority, but to enable the House to act just as it would if it were not for the prevailing filibuster.

The rules that have heretofore been introduced and adopted had relation to legislation upon appropriation bills. In the absence of the first rule that was adopted, the House, proceeding in an orderly way by unanimous consent, would take a House bill with Senate amendments from the Speaker's table, deal with it as it saw fit, and take a long step toward bringing the minds of the two Houses together.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not the manner provided in the rules for disposing of such bills.

Mr. DALZELL. No; but it is a method that has grown up as a custom in the House for many years and is always indulged in unless there be prevailing some such filibuster as there is now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon——

Mr. DALZELL. Under the rules the bill would go to the committee and come back again and then go to the Committee of the Whole House, and all the amendments—for instance, in the legislative bill 367 amendments—would be dealt with in the Committee of the Whole, and days and weeks would be necessary to be spent in passing legislation of the most important character. This filibuster was inaugurated to encourage just such a condition of things in the House. The rule adopted by the House renders nugatory the filibuster and enables us to conduct business in substantially the same way as if the filibuster did not prevail.

The next rule adopted permitted the introduction into the House and the passage by the House of an appropriation bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House to the House without these intervening, dilatory motions calling for the yeas and nays. Now, we come to another class of bills aside from appropriation bills. There is no gentleman in this House who does not know that a very large proportion of the business of this House is done by unanimous consent.

It can not now be done by unanimous consent, because the gentleman from Mississippi objects. He does not object to the granting of unanimous consent having any regard to the merit of the bill or to its lack of merit; he objects because by objecting he can obstruct the public business and compel the House in the execution of its duty——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will submit to a brief interruption.

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the gentleman think it would be fairer to state the motives of the gentleman from Mississippi as he gives them? The gentleman from Mississippi does not refuse unanimous consent "in order to obstruct the business of the House," but in order to prevail upon the majority to bring in for consideration by the House certain proposed legislation.

Mr. DALZELL. Then I will put it this way: The gentleman does not do it to obstruct the business of the House, but he does it for a perfectly impossible purpose. There is no man within the sound of my voice who does not know that it is absolutely impossible for the minority to prevent the majority from enacting such legislation as it sees fit, and there is no gentleman within the sound of my voice who does not know that the minority is equally powerless to compel the majority to enact any legislation that it does not see fit to enact. [Applause on the Republican side.] The purpose of the gentleman from Mississippi is an announced purpose of an attempt to do an impossibility. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DALZELL. I can not yield for an interruption; I have only a few minutes. There are gentlemen on both sides of this House who have bills in which their constituents are vitally interested. By the passage of this rule we will be enabled to deal with that sort of business; in other words, to take up for consideration bills that ordinarily would be considered by unanimous consent. I want to say to you, gentlemen, that you very much mistake the temper of the majority if you think we will not find a means for considering and passing the bills that gentlemen on this side of the House are interested in. How many of your bills will be passed of that character I leave to your imagination. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. We do not care about that threat——

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, I know the gentleman from Mississippi is willing to sacrifice his wife's relations. He says that you do not care about that, but when you gentlemen go back to your constituents and you are asked why this bill or that bill in which they have a vital interest has not been considered, and you answer that you voluntarily cut off from yourselves the possibility of considering such bills because you wanted to make the majority do something that you wanted them to do and they did not, I think that they will tell you that you were playing politics at a very dear cost. [Applause on the Republican side.] I ask for a vote——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays, for fear a request for a division may be disregarded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands his constitutional right, that nobody will ignore. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

So the previous question was ordered.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. BANNON with Mr. FORNES.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania with Mr. GOLDFOGLE.

Mr. BENNETT of Kentucky with Mr. HACKETT.

Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. LONGWORTH with Mr. LASSITER.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa with Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota with Mr. LEAKE.

Mr. CARY with Mr. MAYNARD.

Mr. HUBBARD of Iowa with Mr. RHINOCK.

For this vote:

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan with Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia.

Mr. HALL with Mr. MCHENRY.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE in the chair). On this question the yeas are 139, the nays 111, present 4. The ayes have it, and the previous question is ordered. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before that motion is put, I call for a separate vote on the two different substantive propositions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What are the substantive propositions?

Mr. DALZELL. There are not two. There is only one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The first one is that—

The use of the motion to suspend the rules shall not be restricted to the first and third Mondays of the month.

The second one, which is totally independent and separate, leaving the first one, if it stood by itself, an independent clause and fully complete, is:

The vote on agreeing to the motion shall in all cases be by majority instead of by two-thirds.

Mr. Speaker, I see that there are three substantive propositions. I had not noticed the third one. The third one is:

Upon the demand of any Member opposed to the motion a second shall be considered as ordered.

In other words, unanimous consent for a second shall be considered as granted, rather than the rule now, which is that a majority is necessary to make a second where unanimous consent is refused. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this rule simply read that—

During the remainder of this session Rule XXVIII shall be, and hereby is, modified in the following particular:
The use of the motion shall not be restricted to the first and third Mondays of the month—

It would be a distinct, separate, self-dependent, independent, substantive provision of procedure. If it simply read—

That during the remainder of this session it is hereby modified in the following particular:
That the vote on agreeing to the motion shall, in all cases, be by a majority instead of by two-thirds—

That would also be a separate, distinct, self-dependent, and substantive proposition in itself. And if it read—

That during the remainder of this session Rule XXVIII shall be, and hereby is, modified in the following particular:
Upon the demand of any Member for a second, opposed to a motion, a second shall be considered as ordered—

That would also be complete in itself, independent, self-dependent, and a substantive proposition.

I therefore call for a separate vote upon the three separate propositions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule. The resolution reads:

Resolved, That during the remainder of this session Rule 28 shall be, and hereby is, modified in the following particulars—

That would mean nothing unless the particulars were stated. If that were voted down or up, it would have no effect whatever. And then it reads:

The use of the motion shall not be restricted to the first and third Mondays of the month.

Now, those two propositions, taken together, do make a substantive proposition; but if they were voted down and the House voted for the other proposition—the second proposition—it would have no effect whatever. It would be without sense; it would be nonsense if the House would adopt only what comes after the word "second." Each proposition must stand alone; each proposition must be a substantive proposition. Neither of these propositions will stand alone or could have any effect unless some of the others are adopted. The Chair, therefore, is very clear that there is only one proposition in this resolution, and so rules. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that if all the language after that read by the Chair was voted down, there would still be left a distinct proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Oh, no; the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes. If it would say that the rule would be modified in the following particulars, namely, that the motion to suspend the rules should not be limited to the first and third Mondays—if that were adopted and the balance of the rule——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This language has reference to something in the first proposition, which is a proposition in itself in order to make any sense to it. It does not stand alone. It says:

Second. The vote on agreeing to the motion—

What motion? There is no explanation of that proposition.

Shall in all cases be by majority instead of by two-thirds, and upon the demand of any Member opposed to the motion a second shall be considered as ordered.

There is nothing in the second proposition to show what motion it is or what rule is being affected. The Chair is very clear about it, and will put the motion on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DALZELL. I make the point of order that the appeal is dilatory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, following a long line of precedents, without the question being raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the point of order made by him, is ready to hold that this appeal is dilatory. And the Chair wants to state that time and again Speakers of the House have ruled on a motion such as the gentleman made Saturday, in asking for tellers, that the motion was——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call the Speaker to order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (continuing). Was a dilatory motion, and under the rules it has frequently been ruled out of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call the Speaker to order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 136, nays 116, answered "present" 8, not voting 127, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT ON INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and adopt the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules and adopt the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon that question I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. A second is ordered under the rule, being demanded by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will reserve my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I will ask whether any gentleman on the Democratic side who is on the Committee on Indian Affairs, now present, desires any time. If not, Mr. Speaker, I will confine what remarks I have to make to this small compass—that I do not object to the motion in itself, but I do object to it because of the fact that it is made under this rule, enabling a suspension by bare majority and without the power really to demand a second and to enforce that damand by an adverse vote against the motion. My objection to it is to the method pursued by the majority of this House in securing the passage of the resolution to suspend, and my objection to the method is so great that I shall think it my duty to vote against the motion to suspend the rules for this or any other purpose, except one of plain, palpable, and obvious public benefit, until the proper safeguards for the House—upon that side, as well as upon this side of the Chamber—have been restored by the abrogation of the rule which was passed this morning.

Mr. Speaker, it was not without reason that the rule which is to be abrogated by the special rule was deliberately adopted. When you move to suspend the rules, the House has no power to amend. There is no power to single out the different propositions contained in a motion or bill and to consider them separately upon their respective merits or demerits. The House must vote up the entire proposition or bill or vote down the entire proposition or bill. This was such a summary method of legislating—so much out of the ordinary—that all rules have, from time out of mind, provided that there should first be a second by a majority of the House, and, secondly, that there should be at least a two-thirds majority before that peculiar sort of summary legislation should be enacted.

That rule was adopted for the protection of the country, for the protection of the House, and to secure a consideration by the House of each proposition of legislation upon its individual merits or else to require a majority very large for passage—not less than two-thirds. Attempting to abrogate this rule and to do away with the safeguards surrounding this extraordinary procedure is legislation so bad in itself that nothing, no matter how good, unless there be literally no doubt, it being so plain, ought to be permitted to go through under that procedure of suspending the rules.

Having expressed myself to that effect, I now reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. As many as favor the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill will say aye——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has the previous question been called upon the original motion?

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true. I beg the Chair's pardon.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, division; and I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken and there were—yeas 148, nays 79, answered "present" 15, not voting 145, as follows:

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5126. An act to grant to the city of Seattle, in the State of Washington, certain rights of way for sewer and street purposes through and along the military reservation of Fort Lawton, Wash., and through the reservations for the Lake Washington Canal—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 6335. An act to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Minnesota—to the Committtee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

TRACKS TO UNION STATION.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 902) authorizing certain extensions to be made in the lines of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company, the Washington Railway and Electric Company, the City and Suburban Railway of Washington, and the Capital Traction Company, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and move to suspend the rules, insist on the House amendment, ask a conference with the Senate, and direct the Speaker to appoint the managers without intervening motion.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. A second is ordered under the rules. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee to twenty minutes, and the House will be in order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I may speak somewhat hurriedly, and if I do it is because I desire to yield some time to other Members. After several meetings on the part of the conferees of the Senate and the House, we have failed to agree, and our differences I desire to state. The Senate agrees with the House that the service down New Jersey avenue is preferable to that down North Capitol street and also that the cross-town service is better legislation than that contained in the Senate bill. I think the House will remember the parliamentary situation, that the House struck out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill, and it comes to us to-day in the form of an amendment to the Senate bill. Our main differences are three in number. The Senate insists upon their proposition for tracks in front of the Union Station, which, to make it clear to every Member of the House, are just double the number of those on Pennsylvania avenue. They insist also that on either side of the plaza there should be the same number of tracks that there are upon Pennsylvania avenue, and also down Delaware avenue. The House proposition is to have in front of the Union Station the same number of tracks that are upon Pennsylvania avenue, take the tracks from either side of the plaza, and on the west side let them come up on what is called a new street, and upon the east side upon First street. It is only fair for me to say in this connection that the Senate conferees insist that they inserted the proposition for tracks upon the plaza in the Senate bill, not because of their own wish, but because it was the judgment of the engineers—the engineer of the terminal station, the engineers of the railroad companies, and the report of the Engineer Commissioner of the District.

Our second difference is upon the question of universal transfers. It will be remembered that in the House bill, in sections 16 and 17, we provided for universal transfers. The Senate insists that if we are to have universal transfers the passenger in every case shall pay an additional 2 cents; that is, upon the proposition if you purchase six tickets for a quarter and desire a transfer, that you shall pay an additional 2 cents, or if you pay a straight 5-cent fare, that you shall pay an additional 2 cents for a transfer. In this connection I want to say that one of the conferees of the Senate addressed a letter, which, if there be no objection, I will insert in the RECORD, for I do not think I have the time now to read it, to one of the leading lawyers, if not the leading lawyer, in the city on the question of whether or not the universal-transfer proposition would be legal or constitutional. The letter was addressed to Mr. Darlington of this District, and, not having the time to read the opinion, I can only say that he held that it would be unconstitutional. Upon the other hand, we obtained the opinion of the corporation counsel of the District, and he took an opposite view. I would also like to have the privilege of inserting his opinion in the RECORD.

The third proposition upon which we differ is the question of supervision. It will be remembered that in the eighteenth section of the bill we provided that the railroad companies of the District—that is, the electric railway companies of the District—should be under the supervision of the District Commissioners. To this the Senate conferees object, and, in lieu of the District Commissioners, we offered then to accept the Interstate Commerce Commission. They offered a section in lieu of section 18, but the conferees of the House did not and do not think that the section would be acceptable to the House. Mr. Speaker, we recognize, as conferees on the part of the House, the necessity of getting the tracks to the Union Station, and we can do so by yielding on all three of these propositions.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman mean to say to the House that as a member of the conference committee of the House he recognizes that getting the tracks to the depot is the most important question involved in this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I will not say that it is the most important, but it is one of the most important, to say the least.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think there is any importance attached to the question of universal transfers and supervision by the District Commissioners?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; and I further recognize there is a great deal of importance to be attached to the question of tracks upon the plaza.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the question of getting the tracks to the station seem to the gentleman as more important than the settlement of a question which involves a principle as to whether or not the people of the District have any rights that the traction companies of the District are bound to respect?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I can say to the gentleman, in reply, that the people of the District are repeatedly saying to us that they think the first and important thing is to get the tracks to the station. We are not only urged by the people of the District, but the traveling public that come here are saying to us that they think the most important thing is to get the tracks to the station.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me ask this further question: Does the gentleman think it is of more importance to get the tracks to the station than to insist upon the right of the Congress of the United States to write the laws, rather than let the street railroad companies of the District of Columbia write them?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I think it is only fair to say to the gentleman that it is not the railroad companies of the District that have been insisting, as he suggests. I want to say the leading citizens of the District here are insisting upon these things. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. Twelve minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Will the gentleman yield to one question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Is it not a fact that the lines of both of these companies are interstate lines—that is, that they run beyond the outskirts of the District of Columbia?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They run into Maryland; yes.

Mr. CUSHMAN. If that be true, then, would not the control of these lines, being interstate lines, naturally be vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am not altogether sure about that. I can say to the gentleman, as I said before, that the conferees on the part of the House were perfectly willing to yield, as far as they are concerned, and put the supervision in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Well, if the Interstate Commerce Commission is claiming the power on one hand to control these companies, and the Commissioners of the District upon the other, does it not naturally seem that the proper place to vest the jurisdiction of an interstate carrier would be in the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can say, in that connection, there is some claim made now that the Interstate Commerce Commission have already taken charge of all the electric railroads in the country, not only in the States, but in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CUSHMAN. One other question and then I will subside. If the companies are compelled to put in this loop to the Union Station, what additional compensation will accrue to the companies? What do they get for the money they spend to make this connection, if any?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is a difference of opinion, I want to say to the gentleman, as to whether they will get very much more passenger traffic than now. Possibly they may get some, and some will be taken away from the hacks undoubtedly, but what the railroads will get by putting their tracks in there is not at all very clear——

Mr. CUSHMAN. Has the gentleman anything showing what the additional cost will be to the companies for putting in the loop?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not that alone; but it is estimated that the provisions of the bill S. 902 as amended, I think, in round numbers, will cost these railroads about $1,000,000. That means the service down New Jersey avenue and a cross-town service in addition to other provisions in the bill.

Mr. CUSHMAN. What additional increase will these companies get?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can say to the gentleman that the Washington Electric Company insists that there are not enough people residing in the northeast portion of the city who will avail themselves of this service to make a large item. On the other hand, the Capital Traction Company takes the position and says that if we will authorize them they will build tracks into that section of the city and wait for further developments.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman what is the objection to four tracks on the plaza that the Senate seems to have determined upon?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, the objection that is frequently made by many is that it would be dangerous. That is the oft repeated objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Is there any other objection?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I think that is the most serious objection that is urged.

Mr. ADAIR. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In just a minute.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It strikes me it is exceedingly unfortunate that you have got all of these questions involved in one proposition. Suppose now that the gentleman's motion prevailed. The effect of it would be a final declaration on the part of the House to insist upon every one of the propositions; and will it not most likely result in a disagreement?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope not. As conferees we shall go and try to arrive at some adjustment of this matter; I assure you of that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not believe there is any logical arrangement between the supervision of tracks and the proposition as to transfers.

Mr. ADAIR. The gentleman has stated that the people of the District of Columbia are insisting especially upon these tracks being built to the Union Station.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAIR. I imagine a very large percentage of the population of the city of Washington very seldom go to the Union Station, and I am at a loss to understand the reason for their insisting on this work being done so quickly and so suddenly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the gentleman if he has been reading the editorials in the papers in this city as to what we ought to do?

Mr. ADAIR. I have.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I suppose they speak the sentiment of the community, to some extent.

Mr. ADAIR. Is it the traveling public that is insisting upon this work being done promptly?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will say that many visitors have been in the city for weeks past, and many are here now, and a good deal of complaint is made that there are no tracks to the Union Station.

Mr. ADAIR. Is it not a fact that many times articles in the newspapers do not reflect the sentiment of the people?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes. I will here submit the following letters as a part of my remarks:

SEC. —. That every street railroad company or corporation owning, controlling, leasing, or operating one or more street railroads within the District of Columbia shall, on each and all of its railroads, supply and operate a sufficient number of cars, clean, sanitary, in good repair, with proper and safe power, equipment, appliances, and service, comfortable and convenient, and so operate the same as to give expeditious passage, the speed not to exceed 15 miles per hour within the city limits and 20 miles per hour in the suburbs, and shall do all things reasonable and usual to avoid and discourage the overcrowding of its cars. Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission to make, after notice and hearing, all proper and necessary orders for the enforcement of the provisions of this section, and any railroad company which shall willfully fail to abide by, perform, and carry out any of the provisions of this section within a reasonable time after any order or orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, shall, in every case of refusal or failure, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $100, to be recovered in a suit or suits to be brought by the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, at the direction of and on information furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, April 1, 1908.

MY DEAR MR. DARLINGTON: There is a proposition pending before a conference committee of the two Houses of Congress providing for universal transfers between the Capital Traction Company and the Washington Railway and Electric Company and any other independent companies which may hereafter be created whose lines may connect with existing street railways. I am anxious to know whether or not a provision of that kind would be constitutional. In other words, can one street railway corporation be required to accept from another and wholly unrelated corporation a passenger and transport said passenger without compensation?

I will esteem it a great favor if you will kindly give me your opinion on this subject prior to noon of Friday.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

J. H. GALLINGER, Chairman.

HON. J. J. DARLINGTON, Washington, D. C.

LAW OFFICES OF J. J. DARLINGTON,
410 FIFTH STREET NW.,
Washington, D. C., April 2, 1908.

MY DEAR SIR: In accordance with your letter of the 1st instant, it affords me pleasure to lay before you my opinion as to the constitutionality of the proposed legislation requiring street car companies to transport over their lines, without compensation, any passengers who may have been transported by any other street car company, for compensation, to an intersecting point of their respective lines. This I take to be the purpose of sections 16 and 17 of Senate bill No. 902, though in its present form its effect is to entitle any passenger upon the lines of one street railway company, no matter at what point he may alight therefrom, to a transfer which will entitle him to transportation, without compensation, by any intersecting company, over its lines, if presented within thirty minutes from the arrival of the car upon which he has been a passenger at the transfer or intersecting point.

Each of the street car lines in the District of Columbia exists under a charter prescribing its route and, in consideration of the outlays of money necessary for its construction, equipment, and operation, vesting it with the necessary franchises to use its property, so acquired, for the transportation of passengers over the designated routes, at prescribed rates of fare per passenger, with a reservation of the right by Congress to amend, alter, or repeal the charter act.

Of such charters the Supreme Court has said in the Binghampton Bridge (3 Wall., 51, 73): "We have supposed, if anything was settled by an unbroken course of decisions in the Federal and State courts, it was that an act of incorporation was a contract between the State and the stockholders. All courts at this day are estopped from questioning the doctrine. The security of property rests upon it, and every successful enterprise is undertaken in the unshaken belief that it will never be forsaken. A departure from it now would involve dangers to society that can not be foreseen, would shock the sense of justice of the country, unhinge its business interests, and weaken if not destroy that respect which has always been felt for the judicial department of the Government."

In Delaware Railroad Tax (18 Wall., 206, 225) the same court adds: "Nor does it make any difference that the uses of the corporation are public if the corporation itself be private. The contract is equally protected from legislative interference, whether the public be interested in the exercise of its franchise or the charter be granted for the sole benefit of its corporators."

With respect to the franchises conferred by the charters, the Supreme Court declares that they are, "properly speaking, legal assets vested in the corporation itself as soon as it is in esse. They are not mere naked powers granted to the corporation, but powers coupled with an interest." (Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat., 518, 700; Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How., 133, 150; Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall., 594, 606.) In other words, the franchises are property.

With respect to the right reserved to amend, alter, or repeal, the court in the Sinking-Fund cases (99 U. S., 720) declares: "That this power has a limit no one can doubt. All agree that it can not be used to take away property already acquired under the operation of the charter or to deprive the corporation of the fruits actually reduced to possession of contracts lawfully made; but as was said by this court, through Mr. Justice Clifford, in Miller v. The State (15 Wall., 498), 'it may safely be affirmed that the reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent, to carry into effect the original purposes of the grant or to secure the due administration of its affairs, so as to protect the rights of stockholders and of creditors and for the proper disposition of its assets;' and, again, in Holyoke Company v. Lyman (id., 519), 'to protect the rights of the public and of the corporators or to promote the due administration of the affairs of the corporation.' Mr. Justice Field, also speaking for the court, was even more explicit when, in Tomlinson v. Jessup (id., 459), he said, 'the reservation affects the entire relation between the State and the corporation, and places under legislative control all rights, privileges, and immunities derived by its charter directly from the State;' and, again, as late as Railroad Company v. Maine (96 U. S., 510), 'by the reservation * * * the State retained the power to alter it [the charter] in all particulars constituting the grant to the new company formed under it of corporate rights, privileges, and immunities.' Mr. Justice Swayne in Shields v. Ohio (95 U. S., 324) says, by way of limitation, 'The alterations must be reasonable; they must be made in good faith, and be consistent with the object and scope of the act of incorporation. Sheer oppression and wrong can not be inflicted under the guise of amendment or alteration.' The rules as here laid down are fully sustained by authority. Further citations are unnecessary."

As late as Bienville Water Supply Company v. Mobile (186 U. S., p. 282), the court quotes from the case last cited the following: "All agree that it can not be used to take away property already acquired under the operation of the charter or to deprive the corporation of the fruits actually reduced to possession of contracts lawfully made;" and in the Bienville Company's case the court sustains a decree below, refusing an injunction against the revocation of a clause in its charter giving it the exclusive right to supply the city of Mobile with water, which monopoly was void under the constitution of the State, on the ground that the revocation of the unconstitutional monopoly left to the complainant company unimpaired its right to its tangible property and the right to use that tangible property for the purposes of the charter.

Recurring to the limitation of the power to amend, alter, or repeal, as declared in the Sinking-Fund cases, the present inquiry would seem to be reduced to the question whether a requirement that a passenger who has ridden as far as he desires to be transported upon the lines of one street car company for its prescribed fare shall be transported over the lines of any connecting company, without compensation to it, falls within that limitation. Can such a requirement be said to be one "to carry into effect the original purposes of the grant or to secure the due administration of its affairs so as to protect the rights of stockholders and of creditors," or "for the proper disposition of its assets," or "to protect the rights of the public and of the corporators," or "to promote the due administration of the affairs of the corporation?" In my opinion it falls under no head of the classifications specified.

The same result equally follows from another line of decisions in the Supreme Court.

In the Railroad Commission cases (116 U. S., 307, 331) and again in Railway Company v. Minnesota (134 U. S., 418, 455), the court says: "Under pretence of regulating fares and freights, the State can not require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward, neither can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation or without due process of law;" and in the second case cited, at page 458, it adds: "If the company is deprived of the power of charging reasonable rates for the use of its property, and such deprivation takes place in the absence of an investigation by judicial machinery, it is deprived of the lawful use of its property, and thus, in substance and effect, of the property itself, without due process of law and in violation of the Constitution of the United States."

In Railway Company v. Smith (173 U. S., 684, 694) an act requiring the sale of mileage tickets at a lower than the usual rate is declared unconstitutional on the ground that if the power of the legislature extends so far, "it can compel the company to carry certain persons or classes free." This is precisely what the present proposed requirement undertakes to do. Its provision is that a passenger who, upon payment of its lawful charge for that purpose, has ridden as far as his business or pleasure induces him to go upon the Capital Traction lines shall thereupon be carried free over the lines of the Washington Railway and Electric Company, provided, within thirty minutes from alighting from the Capital Traction car he boards a Washington Railway and Electric car at an intersecting point. It is, in my judgment, no answer to say that the proposed legislation requires the Capital Traction Company to extend a like privilege of free transportation over its lines to passengers of the Washington Railway and Electric Company. The latter owes no duty to its passenger to have him transported beyond its own lines. His transportation beyond them is not even within the scope of its charter nor within the purposes for which its stockholders have expended their money or accepted their charter contract from the Government. It is no part of any duty which is has assumed by the acceptance of its charter, and I can conceive of no legal principle upon which such an obligation can be compulsorily imposed upon it, to be enforced by prosecution and fine in the police court as proposed.

In view of the foregoing it is perhaps scarcely necessary to consider at any length the proposed "alteration" or requirement from the standpoint of its "reasonableness," as essential to its constitutionality under Shields v. Ohio (95 U. S., 324). The route of the Washington Railway and Electric Company embraces, in lineal extent, more than 20 miles; the Washington, Alexandria and Mount Vernon Railway Company about 2 miles, of which about only one-half mile extends along streets occupied for either business or residence purposes. The proposition is that upon terms of offering the like facilities over its inconsiderable, relatively inexpensive, and unimportant route of 2 miles in the District of Columbia, the latter road shall offer to its passengers transportation, free of cost, over the costly and valuable route and equipment of the former company, 23 miles in extent and embracing the principal and most important parts of the city and District. Bearing in mind that the "reasonableness" under consideration relates to the quid pro quo, the compensation given for the service exacted, it must be apparent, I think, that the courts would find it wholly impossible to declare the proposition one reasonably equal between the parties and therefore capable of being sustained. The same inequality, though differing in degree, applies to the other railway companies to be affected.

Other conditions exist which, in my opinion, would render the provision constitutionally invalid, but which, in view of the length of this opinion, I will refer to but briefly.

Corporations, it is elementary, are "persons" in the sense of the law, possessing within their corporate scope the same rights, and subject, only, to the same liabilities as natural persons. The legislature is as much without power to compel the corporation to do an act which it is under no contractural or other obligation to do as to compel a private person to do that act. It may, it is true, "amend, alter, or repeal" the corporate charter within the limitations laid down by the Supreme Court; but this is quite a different thing from compelling it to do acts not within its corporate or charter obligation or scope, under penalty of being prosecuted and fined in the police court.

In Railway Company v. Campbell (61 Kans., 439) an act requiring railroads over which stock was shipped to carry the shipper free of charge, with his stock, was declared unconstitutional.

In Wilson v. Traction Company (72 N. Y. App. Div., 233) a law requiring street car companies to carry policemen and firemen free of charge was held unconstitutional.

In re Parrott (1 Fed. Rep., 481, 486, 491) an article of the constitution of California prohibiting the employment of Chinese by corporations was held to be unconstitutional and not a legitimate exercise of the reserved power. "It amounts in effect to a declaration that the corporation formed under the laws of this State, and their stockholders, hold their property, so far as its beneficial use and enjoyment are concerned, at the mercy of the legislature, and that rights which in the case of private individuals would be inviolable, have for them no existence. * * * It is not merely the title to the property that is protected from legislative confiscation, but that which gives value to all property, the right to its lawful use and enjoyment."

The foregoing considerations leave no doubt, in my own mind, that the proposed legislation is in violation of the Constitution, and incapable of being enacted into valid law.

Yours, very truly, J. J. DARLINGTON.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

OFFICE OF THE CORPORATION COUNSEL,
Columbian Building, April 8, 1908.

Hon. SAMUEL W. SMITH,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
House of Representatives, City.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your letter of the 6th instant, referring to me the written opinion of Mr. J. J. Darlington in the matter of the validity of sections 16 and 17 of Senate bill No. 902, which is addressed to the extension of certain lines of street railway companies, and, among other things, to universal transfers, so-called.

For purposes of this review I divide the matters discussed into matters of law and matters of fact.

The matters of law suggested, briefly stated, are that the charters granted street railway companies constitute contracts which prevent legislative interference; that the franchises granted both in reference to corporate existence and privileges are powers coupled with an interest, legal assets, or property; that the right reserved in the charters to alter, amend, or repeal can not be used to take away property; that a reasonable compensation for carriage of passengers is not provided, and that Congress is without power to require street railway corporations to comply with the sections mentioned, because the things required are not within their corporate obligations.

While the universal transfer system proposed is new, yet Congress has, under the power reserved by it to alter, amend, or repeal street railway charters, regulated transfers, exchange of tickets, rates of fare, reciprocal trackage, and extension of lines for public convenience.

By act of Congress approved June 6, 1900, the Metropolitan Railroad Company was required to extend its lines from Eighteenth street and Columbia road to Sixteenth street and Park street, and was assessed benefits for the widening of Sixteenth street and Columbia road, under the provisions of this act, to the extent of $25,000.

By act of August 2, 1894 (28 Stat., 217), it is provided:

"SEC. 5. That the Metropolitan Railroad Company is hereby authorized and required immediately to make reciprocal transfer arrangements with street railroad companies whose lines now connect with its lines and to furnish such facilities therefor as the public convenience may require. Upon the completion of the underground electric system provided for in this act the said Metropolitan Railroad Company is hereby further authorized and required to enter into reciprocal trackage arrangements with connecting roads. The schedules and compensation shall be mutually agreed upon between the said Metropolitan Railroad Company and the companies with whose lines its lines connect; and in any case of failure to reach such mutual agreement, the matters in dispute shall be determined by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, upon petition filed by either party: Provided, That every street railway company in the District of Columbia whose lines connect, or whose lines may hereafter connect, with the lines of any other street railway company, is hereby subjected to the same requirements as to transfers and trackage arrangements, and upon similar conditions, as in this section provided in the case of the Metropolitan Railroad Company and the lines connecting therewith."

The original charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company, March 31, 1865 (13 Stat., 536, sec. 1), allowed a rate of fare not exceeding 8 cents per passenger.

The exchange of tickets was provided for by act of May 25, 1894 (28 Stat., 78).

Free transfers were also provided by section 3 of the act of May 28, 1896 (29 Stat., 187).

"SEC. 3. That the Capital Railway Company, the Metropolitan Railroad Company, and the Capital Traction Company are hereby required to issue free transfers at the point of intersection of their respective lines, so that for the payment of one fare a passenger on either road shall have the privilege of riding over the lines of both."

See also act of June 25, 1898, section 3.

Section 19 of the charter of the East Washington Heights Traction Company, approved June 18, 1898, provides:

"SEC. 19. That said company shall receive a rate of fare not exceeding 5 cents per passenger; but six tickets shall be sold for 25 cents: Provided, That the said company and the Capital Traction Company are hereby required to issue free transfers, whereby a passenger on the said East Washington Heights Traction Company shall be entitled to a continuous ride over the line of the other company, or vice versa."

Many other provisions of law might be cited in illustration of the control Congress has exercised under the power reserved to it over street railway corporations.

All street railway charters contain the provision that Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal them.

While a State may grant a charter to a private corporation whose uses are public so as to vest rights which subsequent legislation can not render invalid without "impairing the obligation of contracts," in my judgment the charters of the street railway companies are not within this principle, for the reason, among others, that they were granted and accepted under the reserved power to alter, amend, or repeal them. Whether the question of the impairment of the obligation of contracts is involved under the provisions of section 10 of the Constitution of the United States may be doubted, but this question is not necessarily involved here.

In Metropolitan Railroad Company v. Macfarland et al. (20 App. D. C., 421–439) the court of appeals, in referring to the act of Congress of June 6, 1900, above mentioned, said:

"It may be conceded that this reserved power in Congress is not entirely without limit, and that the power to alter, amend, or repeal must be exercised within reasonable bounds for the preservation of right and justice. It has been said by high authority that the power must not be exercised in such arbitrary way as to destroy vested rights acquired in good faith under the charter powers of the corporation. But it does not follow that this power to alter or amend may not be exercised to add new duties and obligations to those originally imposed, though such new duties and obligations may require the expenditure of large sums of money in their performance.

"The question is, For what purpose was this power of alteration, amendment, and repeal reserved, if not to be exercised to promote the interest of the public and to meet the requirement of that interest as it may arise? It was certainly not only intended to authorize the making of mere formal changes in the charter, but, as it has been most justly said, one of the most obvious reasons for reserving to the legislature the right to alter, amend, or repeal such charters is to enable it to compel an unwilling corporation to perfect and extend its connections with other railroads, or to extend its road to certain localities, as the convenience of the public may from time to time require."

The court also said:

"It is contended that Congress could not exercise the power of requiring or compelling the extension of the lines of the road, as required in this case, without the consent of the corporation. But to sustain such a contention would simply render the reserved power to Congress to alter, amend, or repeal the charter nugatory and without effect. The very object of this reservation of power in the charter was to dispense with the consent of the corporation, and to retain a power superior to the mere will of the corporation, or those who compose it. Nor can the exercise of such reserved power be construed as impairing the obligation of a contract as between Congress and the corporation."

Shields v. Ohio (95 U. S., 319, 326) affords an example of the valid change of a railroad rate for passengers under the reserved power to alter, amend, or repeal. In that case the legislature in 1846 incorporated a railroad company and empowered it to charge such tolls for the transportation of freight and passengers as it might deem "reasonable." In 1873 the legislature enacted that "any corporation operating a railroad in whole or in part in this State may demand and receive for the transportation of passengers over said road not exceeding 3 cents per mile for a distance of more than 8 miles." The charter granted the company was subject to the constitutional provision that no "special privileges or immunities shall ever be granted that may not be altered, revoked, or repealed by the general assembly." The court discussed both the question of franchise and the power of alteration and amendment. It said:

"It is urged that the franchise here in question was property held by a vested right, and that its sanctity, as such, could not be thus invaded. The answer is consensus facit jus. It was according to the agreement of the parties. The company took the franchise, subject expressly to the power of alteration or repeal by the general assembly. There is, therefore, no ground for just complaint against the State.

"When an act of incorporation is repealed, few questions of difficulty can arise. Equity takes charge of all the property and effects which survive the dissolution and administers them as a trust fund, primarily for the benefit of the creditors. If anything is left it goes to the stockholders. Even the executory contracts of the defunct corporation are not extinguished. (Curran v. Arkansas, 12 How., 304.)

"The power of alteration and amendment is not without limit. The alterations must be reasonable; they must be made in good faith, and be consistent with the scope and object of the act of incorporation. Sheer oppression and wrong can not be inflicted under the guise of amendment or alteration. Beyond the sphere of reserved powers, the vested rights of property of corporations, in such cases, are surrounded by the same sanctions and are as inviolable as in other cases. Two authoritative adjudications throw a strong light from opposite directions upon this subject. We cite them only for the purpose of illustration. In Miller v. Railroad Company (21 Barb., 513), the legislature under the reserved power of alteration, required the company, which had been previously incorporated, to construct a highway across their road. The work was expensive and of no benefit to the company. The act imposing the burden was held to be void.

"In Worcester v. Railroad Company (109 U. S., 103), the legislature had passed an act requiring the railroad companies therein named to unite in a passenger station in the city of Worcester (the place to be fixed as provided), to extend their tracks in the city to the union station, and, after the extension, to discontinue parts of their existing locations. The act was held to be constitutional and valid, being a reasonable exercise of the right reserved to the legislature to amend, alter, or repeal the charters of those companies." (See also Com. v. Essex Co., 13 Gray, 239, and Crease v. Babcock, 23 Pick., 334.)

The law proposed to be enacted does not on its face purport to deprive street railroad companies of their property, tangible or intangible, within or beyond their charters.

In Maine Central Railroad Company v. Maine (96 U. S., 499) Mr. Justice Field said:

"By the reservation in the law of 1831, which is to be considered as if embodied in that act, the State retained the power to alter it in all particulars constituting the grant to the new company, formed under it, of corporate rights, privileges, and immunities. The existence of the corporation and its franchises and immunities, derived directly from the State, were thus kept under its control. Rights and interests acquired by the company, not constituting a part of the contract of incorporation, stand upon a different footing."

In Miller v. New York State (82 U. S., 478) Mr. Justice Clifford said:

"The reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent, to carry into effect the original purposes of the grant or to secure the due administration of its affairs so as to protect the rights of the stockholders and of creditors, and for the proper disposition of the assets."

In Tomlinson v. Jessup (82 U. S., 454) Mr. Justice Field said:

"The reservation affects the entire relation between the State and the corporation, and places under legislative control all rights, privileges, and immunities derived by its charter directly from the State. Rights acquired by third parties, and which have become vested under the charter, in the legitimate exercise of its powers, stand upon a different footing; but of such rights it is unnecessary to speak here. The State only asserts in the present case the power under the reservation to modify its own contract with the corporators; it does not contend for a power to revoke the contracts of the corporation with other parties, or to impair any vested right thereby acquired."

Mr. Justice Brewer, in Bienville Water Supply Company v. Mobile (186 U. S., 212), said:

"All agree that it can not be used to take away property already acquired under the operation of the charter, or to deprive the corporation of the fruits actually reduced to possession of contracts lawfully made. Nothing of this nature was, however, attempted by this legislation. The plaintiff was left in undisturbed possession of its tangible property. So we need not stop to consider what protection could be afforded if the attempt had been made to take away its property."

The proposed act applies to all passengers, and does not therefore constitute a discrimination in favor of a special class constituting a small number of the whole community, which was the fact in Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railway Company v. Smith (173 U. S., 684).

In Elliott on Railroads, second edition, section 1602 (vol. 4, p. 447), it is said:

"A regulation requiring a transfer check where the fare is paid upon one line and a transfer is permitted to another line for the one fare is reasonable and valid in the absence of any charter or statutory provision to the contrary, and the company is not liable for the ejection of a traveler who has entered a car on the second line, at a point or a time different from the reasonable time and place specified in his transfer check, and refuses to pay his fare." Citing Percy v. Metropolitan Railroad Company (58 Mo. App., 75); also Heffron v. Detroit City Railroad Company (92 Mich., 406; 52 N. W., 802; 16 L. R. A., 345; 31 Am. St., 601).

Application of the principles set forth in the cases cited, and in cases not cited, to the proposed legislation indicates to my mind that contract rights are not impaired thereby, and that the real question as to the validity of the legislation turns upon whether there is a taking of property without just compensation or without due process of law.

There must be evidence that fares will be reduced to a confiscatory amount or to an amount which would render it unprofitable to operate the road. Thus the constitution of the State of Texas provided that: "No irrevocable or uncontrollable grant of special privileges or immunities shall be made; but all privileges and franchises granted by the legislature or created under its authority shall be subject to the control thereof."

After the adoption of this constitution the city extended the charter rights of two street railway companies and provided that they should charge 5-cent fare for one continuous ride over any one of their lines, with one transfer to or from either line to the other. Later the city passed an ordinance which provided that street railway companies should issue half-fare tickets to school children. It was held that no contract existed with respect to which it could be asserted that this legislation impaired its obligation, and that as there was no allegation that the fares had been reduced to a confiscatory amount or to an amount which would render it unprofitable to operate the road, and no evidence that the reduction of the school tickets in question would seriously impair its revenues or leave the company an insufficient income to pay for repairs or a fair income on its investment, the provision in favor of school children mentioned was valid. (San Antonio Traction Company v. Altgelt, 200 U. S., 304.)

It may be noted, although not expressly in point, that the Supreme Court decided November 4, 1907, that a street railway company whose charter subjects it to "all the duties, liabilities, and restrictions set forth in all general laws now or hereafter in force relating to street railway companies," is bound by the requirements of a statute previously enacted that street railway companies shall transport school children at a reduced rate, although such statute may be unconstitutional as to already existing corporations. Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for himself, declared the act to be constitutional on the theory that such an act is a valid exercise by a State of its police power, education being one of the purposes for which this power may be exercised. Justice Harlan concurred in the affirmance of the decision of the lower court on the ground that the act in question did not deny to the railway company equal protection of the laws, nor did it deprive it of its property without due process of law. (Interstate Consolidated Street Railway Company v. Massachusetts, Advance Sheets No. 2, p. 26.)

In rate cases the Supreme Court originally held that the legislature had power to fix rates, and that the courts had no power to pass upon the reasonableness of such rates. Later cases qualify this doctrine by declaring that statutes fixing rates amounting to confiscation are void. The rule now may be fairly stated to be that the State has the power to regulate rates, but that such regulation must not operate to deprive anyone of a fair and reasonable return upon the money invested in such enterprise. If the State does enact statutes which operate to deprive anyone of a fair and reasonable return upon the capital invested in such enterprise, then recourse may be had to the courts to determine the reasonableness of such rates, and if they are found to be unreasonable their enforcement may be enjoined. The ultimate decision, therefore, must in all cases rest upon the result of judicial review. Many cases might be cited, but it is deemed sufficient to refer to Stanislaus County v. San Joaquin (C. & I. Co., 192 U. S., 201), where Mr. Justice Peckham said:

"It is not confiscation nor a taking of property without due process of law, nor a denial of the equal protection of the laws, to fix water rates so as to give an income of 6 per cent upon the then value of the property actually used, for the purpose of supplying water as provided by law, even though the company had prior thereto been allowed to fix rates that would secure to it 1½ per cent a month income upon the capital actually invested in the undertaking. If not hampered by an unalterable contract, providing that a certain compensation should always be received, we think that a law which reduces the compensation heretofore allowed to 6 per cent upon the present value of the property used for the public is not unconstitutional. There is nothing in the nature of confiscation about it."

It may be that the street railway companies involved must accept or reject the proposed legislation entirely; and that, if they do not, the extension of their lines, as provided in the act, may operate as an acceptance of the universal-transfer provision and prevent valid objection on their part thereto.

As before pointed out, there is no unjust discrimination in the proposed legislation such as existed in the case cited to sustain this proposition. Is it not likely, however, that the free-transfer provision will inure to the benefit of the companies by increasing the number of passengers carried, and hence afford them a larger income than they now enjoy?

Mr. Justice Brewer said, in Chicago Railway Company v. Wellman (143 U. S., 343): "May it not be possible—indeed, does not all experience suggest the probability—that a reduction of rates will increase the amount of business, and, therefore, of earnings?"

Is not the power which it is proposed to exercise in promotion of the interest of the public and for the convenience of the public, and therefore within the reserved power of alteration, amendment, and repeal as indicated by our court of appeals in the case cited?

It may be wise to provide for intercorporate adjustment between railway companies of railroad fares by agreement between the companies in respect to the carriage of passengers on universal transfers, and, in event of disagreement, for adjudication of the question involved by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, as has been done in previous legislation affecting street railway companies.

Of course, if Congress has information that the rate prescribed is confiscatory or would destroy the franchises or property of street railway companies the legislation could not be legally justified. On the other hand, can it be foretold that the legislation is destructive or confiscatory until after the operation of the universal-transfer system for a reasonable time?

In conclusion, my opinion is that the legislation is valid on its face, but is subject to judicial review.

Respectfully submitted.

EDWARD H. THOMAS,
Corporation Counsel.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to be notified when I have used fifteen minutes.

Mr. Speaker, in considering and acting on the matters in conference there is much of an embarrassing nature. If there is a more embarrassing service in this House than the service on the District Committee I do not know what it is, and especially when we come to deal with the public-service franchise corporations. The people of this District who are well to do, many of them, are owners of stocks in these corporations. We meet them everywhere. They are nice people. There is no reflection to be made upon them, but they have an interest to serve. We as conferees have nothing but a public interest, or ought not to have anything but a public interest, in the legislation proposed. Everywhere we go we meet somebody who is ready to frown and say that you are holding the tracks away from the Union Station, and that you are discommoding the public, all of which is true. Why is it true? Because Congress heretofore has voted the right to these corporations to use and operate their cars on these streets without a cent of compensation; have given them monopolistic powers, franchises of great value; and my experience has been, so far as these street-car companies are concerned, that it has been absolutely impossible to legislate against them when they were not asking for legislation, and almost impossible when they are. For three months or more we have considered this bill, the House Committee and the House conferees, after a vote in the House that was unanimous. What are the differences? The chairman has explained. The material differences are two. The demand on the part of the House for free transfers for passengers. The other is, that the railway companies of the District of Columbia shall be subjected to a reasonable and just but mandatory control, lodged somewhere, in some commission capable of exercising it—the bill provides the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, because they are the local managing board, so to speak, of such matters in the District. They are, as it were, the mayor and the executive officers of the District.

But when these gentlemen, the officers of these companies, representing them, come before the committee they say that they have no objection to the present Commissioners. They are opposed to lodging power in the Commissioners that requires expert knowledge.

Then the proposition is made to let the Interstate Commerce Commission have these powers, which they are claiming to be altogether too great to be intrusted to the District Commissioners, who have control of everything else. We say we will give it to those who control 220,000 miles of steam railways; but even with this they do not want the language conferring this control used in the House bill. We insist on giving it to them. What is the idea of these street car companies? What is their idea of control? For fear I may make a mistake I will read what Colonel Hamilton, an able lawyer and excellent gentleman, who has lately been elected president of the Capital Traction Company, said when he came before the conference committee. He said:

So far as the control feature is concerned, we are decidedly opposed to it. We are not opposed to a fair and reasonable control by Congress.

* * * * * * *

That would be my view on the subject and is, I am sure, the view of the board that I have the honor to represent on the matter of control.

Congress controls—or the committees control, and that means control of Congress virtually by these gentlemen—not corruptly, not dishonestly, not improperly. Now they absolutely refuse to remove all trouble in the way of the conferees by coming up like patriots and saying, "We will give you a free transfer, and we do not object to control, because we do not expect to do anything wrong."

Who is Colonel Hamilton? He is the attorney of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway Company. He is the attorney of the Washington Terminal Company. He was lately made president of the Capital Traction Company in the place of the lamented Mr. Dunlop, a practical man. What does he know about operating street railroads? He may know all about it, but if he does it does not so appear. Why was he selected? The stockholders had a right to select whomsoever they chose. Why was Mr. Hamilton elected, Mr. Speaker, excepted to utilize such influence in legislation as a gentleman occupying the position he does would naturally have? Congressional control means committee control—that is exactly what it means—because this House does not have time to take up everything coming from the District Committee, and must accept virtually what the committee recommends. Now, how embarrassing it is when Congress or a committee of Congress, even the present committee of conference of both Houses, have to consider matters pertaining to the franchise corporations here, whose emoluments grow out of grants of legislation, to find high officials of this Government stockholders in these very corporations. It is very embarrassing. It is not unlawful for them to hold these stocks. It is not unlawful for a Member of the House or a member of the Senate to be a stockholder in these franchise corporations, but it is exceedingly embarrassing. One of these companies is but little short of a monopolistic trust. It combines in its ownership a number of street car companies, as well as the Electric Light and Power Company. The Electric Light and Power Company is furnishing $142,000 per annum worth of service to the Government of the United States and the District by way of public lighting. Each of these street railways performs service for the Government of the United States and District of Columbia.

What do I find in reading over this list of stockholders here? In the Capital Traction Company one Senator is reported as the owner of a large number of shares. These are reports made to Congress. I am telling no secrets and disclosing nothing that you do not or can not know. I have got nothing to say about him except to commend him for having the courage to have the stock in his own name. What else? Why, last fall the papers were full of the story that another gentleman in high official station, who must necessarily have great influence in legislation, had become a large stockholder in the Washington Electric Railway Company, which company also owns the Electric Light and Power Company. Who is he? William Loeb, jr., of New York. Who is William Loeb, and what are his qualifications for the office of director? The newspapers show that he was elected a director of this company, and the newspapers further say that he is to be president of the company. The report, which is sworn to, shows that he owns 4,700 shares of the stock of the Washington Electric Railway Company, which owns the Electric Light and Power Company that sells its service to the Government of the United States, as I have stated, to the amount of about $142,000 per annum for public lighting.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my colleague yield? Does this Senator to whom he has referred object to regulation by the Commission?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know that he does.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think Congress ought to say a word to him.

Mr. SIMS. I had just as soon that the Senator now owning the stock should continue to own it as for any other Senator to own it. But I wish to read the biography of William Loeb, jr., as found in the Congressional Directory:

William Loeb, jr., of Albany, N. Y., secretary to the President (1454 Rhode Island avenue), was born in the city of Albany, N. Y., October 9, 1866; had common and high school education; in 1888 was stenographer of the New York State assembly; afterwards was law and general reporter and acted as private secretary to various public officials, among them the president pro tempore of New York State senate, speaker of the assembly, and lieutenant-governor; in 1894, constitutional convention; in 1895, grand jury and district attorney's stenographer of Albany County; January 1, 1895, stenographer and private secretary to the governor of New York; March 4, 1901, appointed secretary to the Vice-President of the United States; September 25, 1901, appointed assistant secretary to the President; February 18, 1903, appointed secretary to the President.

His whole qualifications are those of a stenographer. These fit him for the duties of a private secretary. But why should he be made a director and mentioned for the presidency of a corporation that in part sells its services to the Government of the United States and is regulated alone by the laws of Congress? Is it not embarrassing? It is not unlawful to own these shares of stock; but suppose the private secretary of the Speaker of the House should own such stocks, or suppose our own private secretaries owned stock? Why not? If it is right for one member of a legislative body to hold stock in a public-service corporation, it is right for all.

Are we going to stand here and let two grasping, greedy corporations, while nominally independent, but really working together, say "We defy you?" They have repealable charters. I say to them, "We will repeal your charters, and we will charter a new company, and that new charter will have restrictions in it, and one of them will be that no officer of the Government of the United States will be a stockholder or a director in such company." If it is right for one Member of Congress to own stock, it is right for all. If it is right for the Secretary to the President of the United States, on the pay roll of the Government of the United States, to be a director in a public-service corporation which is selling part of its service to the Government, it is right for every secretary of every Cabinet officer to do the same.

I am not making a personal attack upon these gentlemen. God knows I do not want to; but a sense of duty compels me to tell the truth. This matter stands too high for personal friendship or personal like or dislike to stand in the way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as a conferee I do not need any instruction. I will stand for these provisions. A few mornings ago I saw a woman on a street car, with a strap in one hand and a child in the other, who could not get a seat. Yet these corporations, which perpetrate such outrages, are maintained, paid, and sustained by the powers given by this Congress. I want to look the Member of this House in the face who will vote to send the street-car tracks down to that station without these provisions, with the absolute knowledge beforehand that it means we will never touch them again, so far as service regulation is concerned or so far as a reduction of fares is concerned. You do not have to instruct me. I am going to stand out for these provisions until this Congress ends, if the Union Station goes down with it. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. The Capital Traction Company earns $1,500 per annum on every car it operates. Its earnings are increasing every day. The ever-increasing population of the District adds new value to the property. This company is capitalized for $660,000 per mile, and pays dividends on it. No one will claim that it costs anything like this to build and equip the road. Ninety thousand dollars a single-track mile is all that can be honestly spent for that purpose. So that if we allow $180,000 per double-track mile as the cost it will be seen that the company is capitalized for nearly four times the cost. This looks like watering stock. What has Congress done to prevent it? Nothing.

The Washington Electric Railway Company owns 149 miles of single track, about 90 miles of which is overhead trolley, costing not to exceed $30,000 per mile to build and equip; about 60 miles is underground, costing not to exceed $90,000 per mile to build and equip. This company is capitalized and bonded for $33,000,000, and earns dividends and pays interest on it. Will anyone contend that this company is being unjustly treated? Will anyone deny that several barrels of water have been pumped into the capital of this company? What are we going to do about it? What can we do about it? We seem to be powerless. The railroad companies seem to have more power to legislate on the transportation question than Congress has.

Legislation is pending to provide for transportation facilities to the Union Passenger Station. This legislation was passed by the House with a provision for universal free transfers, and one authorizing the District Commissioners to supervise and regulate the operation of the cars. The companies object to these conditions. They are the first Congress has attempted to impose. Arguments are made to the effect that railroad facilities to and from the Union Station are of paramount importance and that all conditions should be set aside to that end.

It is desirable that street car facilities be afforded those wishing o reach the Union Station, but it is vastly more important hat the rights of the people be conserved. Better never allow lines built or cars operated to the Union Station than that they should be built and operated on terms dictated by the street car companies. The question is, Shall the Congress of the United States or the traction companies write the laws under which the traction companies are given the right to operate? [Applause.]

Shall we fix the terms on which the railroad companies can operate, or shall the railroad companies be allowed to tell the Congress the kind of laws they will accept? This is a question of vital importance to the people of America. We should name conditions just alike to the companies and the people, and if the present companies are unwilling to accept such terms, the privilege of operating cars in the District should be given to others.

We grant the street car companies the privileges which they enjoy; we give them the opportunity of earning large dividends on fabulous capitalization; we supply part of their capital by giving the use of the streets; we give them these rights, and they want them without conditions. Are the people to receive no consideration at the hands of these companies? Are we to sit here and be dictated to, or will we refuse to act unless the companies are willing to accept the privileges on equitable terms? Shall they be granted the privilege of operating cars in the District of Columbia without conditions, or shall we demand such conditions as the importance of the concessions warrant us in demanding on behalf of the people? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois two minutes more.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Speaker, my thought is that the most important question before the House to-day is not Shall the street railroad companies be unconditionally permitted to extend their tracks to the Union Station, but Shall the Congress of the United States make conditions upon which they will allow the street railway companies to operate the street railways within the District of Columbia? The most important question before the House to-day is not Shall the House agree to the method of reaching the Union Station as proposed by the Senate or as proposed by the House, but Shall the Congress name the terms to be imposed on the street railway companies as a condition precedent for being permitted to operate street cars on any street in the District of Columbia?

The question is, Have the people in the District of Columbia the right to be represented on this floor by Members of Congress, and if they have that right, will we protect them in the exercise of the right by insisting upon the imposition of such conditions as will compel the street car companies to operate their cars on the streets of the District of Columbia on such terms as will enable every man, woman, and child, whether he be permanently a resident of the District or only temporarily such, to feel that their interests are certain to be properly safeguarded by their representatives in this body? The question before us is, Shall we insist upon the instruction which we gave to the committee on conference to maintain the position heretofore taken by the House of Representatives, namely, that universal transfers shall be given and that the Commissioners of the District shall be empowered to regulate the street car service? By all means we should never yield. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if I understand this situation, the differences between the two Houses upon which the legislation is hanging are threefold. Neglecting the third difference, which is relatively unimportant; the House insists upon universal transfers and the Senate refuses them. Secondly, the House also insists upon giving to some public utilities commission—the particular proposition is to the District Commissioners—the powers of commissioners to secure efficient service, equal treatment, and so forth. As far as I am concerned, speaking as a Member of the House, I would rather stay here until July than to let the Senate, if it is determined upon it—I hope it is not so much determined upon it as not to withdraw after a while—win out in this particular fight. [Applause.] The question of free transfers is very important, but the most important question is to give to some commission, whether the existing District Commission or a board or commission created for that special purpose by compromise in conference, the power to supervise these utilities and to see that the service rendered by them is efficient and that the management of them is honest.

Now, I think that the people of the District of Columbia—those of them who are wise and patriotic, at any rate—will be willing "to walk a while" from C street to the railway station rather than to forego either one of these two ends, but especially rather than to surrender the latter one of the two. Mr. Speaker, I think the House conferees might very well agree to give up so much of their proposition as involves the idea that the commission shall be constituted of the present District Commissioners. They could agree to a specially created public-utilities commission. I do not think they ought to give up, however, to another compromise idea that I understand has been proffered, which is to confer this duty upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission is not adapted for it. It has too much to do already. But we ought to insist that a commission of some sort competent for this purpose should be clothed with the power and duties set forth in the House amendment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that the street railroads of the District of Columbia object to the provision which puts the supervisory control of the street railroads in the District Commissioners. That board is not permanent or continuing in its personnel. Its membership shifts frequently; it is absorbed in administrative work in a large degree; it does not and can not have expert knowledge of transportation matters; it is in a sense a political body, and I do not think the control of the street railways should be placed in the District Commissioners. I believe that supervisory control ought to be put under the Interstate Commerce Commission, a permanent board engaged in the control of transportation companies, a board that is supposed to have expert knowledge, and I believe the result will be infinitely better all the way around. I expect to vote for the motion, however, to adhere to the House propositions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in the moment I have remaining I want to say to the House that our difficulty as conferees is this: We talk with a portion of the Members of the House, and they say do not yield on the proposition of the tracks. Another portion say do not yield on transfers, and another portion of the House say never yield on the third proposition. Now, I regret, as one of the conferees, that we could not have an hour or two in which the Members of the House could express their views so that we might be able to arrive at some idea of what the House would like to have us do.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. In regard to the provision applying to universal transfers I understand one portion of the House wants you to stand for it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. But you can not say what the House wants you to stand for——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I can not say——

Mr. MADDEN. Then would the gentleman be willing to take the consensus of opinion relating to it by a vote of the House?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would be very glad to have such an expression of opinion.

Mr. MADDEN. Then will not the gentleman modify his motion so as to give an opportunity to instruct the conferees?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to say to the gentleman that after conferring among ourselves and with Members of the House it was not thought wise for us to ask for a motion of that kind at this time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on suspending the rules——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, before that question is put to the House I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry. The motion made by the gentleman representing the conferees of the House provides that the conference committee shall insist and ask for a conference and that conferees may be appointed without intervening motion. I wish to ask whether, in view of that situation, the motion now to instruct the conferees would be in order.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it be in order by unanimous consent? If it were, I would like to ask unanimous consent to make the motion to instruct the conferees when the time comes.

The SPEAKER. If this motion is agreed to, it disposes of it. It suspends the rules and disposes of the proposition before the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it be in order, then, Mr. Speaker, to ask the gentleman representing the conferees, who made this motion, to withdraw that part of the motion which prevents the making of another motion to instruct the conferees upon the question?

The SPEAKER. A second has been ordered. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. MADDEN. My request is for unanimous consent to be permitted to make a motion to instruct the conferees on the bill now before the House to insist upon the position which the House has already taken.

The SPEAKER. That motion can be put later, but the matter pending, and debate having been exhausted upon the motion to suspend the rules, it occurs to the Chair that that motion had better be disposed of.

Mr. MADDEN. Very well.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent can take care of itself after the motion is disposed of.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suggest that a vote on this motion is substantially an instruction. If the motion prevails, it is equivalent to an instruction to insist upon the House proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to suspend the rules, insist on the House amendment to the Senate bill, ask a conference with the Senate, and direct the Speaker to appoint the managers without intervening motion.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 218, nay 1, answered "present" 10, not voting 158, as follows:

YEAS—218.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] rise?

Mr. MADDEN. For the purpose of ascertaining whether or not it is now in order to move a resolution of instructions to the conferees on the bill S. 902, or, in lieu of the right to move such a resolution, ask unanimous consent for the purpose of introducing such a resolution?

The SPEAKER. The House has just insisted on its agreement to the Senate amendment, and the Chair announces the following conferees under the order: Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. CAMPBELL, and Mr. SIMS.

Now, the gentleman asks if it will be in order to move to instruct the House conferees. It would not be in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to introduce the following resolution of instruction.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like the resolution read for information. I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection until the resolution is read.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES] objects.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will not object until after we have heard the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserve the objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no option if the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not reserve his objection.

Mr. BATES. I reserve the objection in order to listen to the resolution of instruction.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House conferees be, and they are hereby, instructed to insist on the universal-transfer provision in the bill S. 902, and on the provision empowering the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to supervise and regulate the method of running the cars, or for the appointment of a special commission with authority to regulate said cars.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BATES. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] is recognized.

MEDICAL CORPS OF THE ARMY.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and adopt the conference report upon the bill S. 1424, the bill to increase the efficiency of the medical corps of the Army.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves to suspend the rules and agree to the conference report on the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1424) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands a second. A second is ordered under the rules. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] to twenty minutes.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the statement attached to the conference report may be read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, before that request is put to the House, I would like to ask if the conference report is there?

Mr. YOUNG. It is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So you ask consent to read the statement in lieu of the conference report?

Mr. YOUNG. I am not. I am asking consent to read the statement in my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To that I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The conference report or the statement should have been read before the second was ordered. Without objection, the conference report or the statement, one or both, will be read. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The conference report and statement were read, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

[To accompany S. 1424.]

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1424) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 2.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 4, 5, and 7; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out insert "and five;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment strike out "twenty-nine" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-seven;" and the House agree to the same.

JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 1424) "To increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army," submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and submitted in the accompanying conference report on the amendments of the House, namely:

Amendment No. 1 proposes to make the number of colonels in the Medical Department 14 instead of 16, as proposed by the Senate; and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 2 proposes to make the number of lieutenant-colonels 20 instead of 24, as proposed by the Senate; and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 3 proposes to make the number of majors 100 instead of 110, as proposed by the Senate; and the Senate recedes with an amendment, making the number 105.

Amendment No. 4 provides that only officers below the rank of lieutenant-colonel must pass an examination for promotion; and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 5 makes that portion of the bill agree with the portion amended by amendment No. 4; and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 6 provides that any contract surgeon not over 29 years old at date of his appointment as such shall be eligible to appointment in the regular corps; and the Senate recedes with an amendment, making the age 27 instead of 29.

Amendment No. 7 provides that any officer of the Medical Reserve Corps who is subject to call and who shall be ordered upon active duty as provided in the bill, and who shall be unwilling and refuse to accept such service shall forfeit his commission; and the Senate recedes.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that this conference report makes very little change practically in the bill as it passed the House. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the passage of the bill, and if any gentleman on this side is opposed to it and wants any time, I will be glad to yield it to him. Otherwise I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as it seems the bill will probably pass unanimously, I will not occupy the entire five minutes in discussing the question, but I want to say that I consider this one of the most important bills that ever came before this House. If there is one thing that was absolutely demonstrated in the Spanish war it was that our Medical Corps was not properly organized, that the great number of men that we lost in that war were lost from sickness and not from bullets. We lost them because we did not have the proper organization to meet the emergency when the war took place. This is a delayed bill, coming ten years after the Spanish war, attempting to perfect an organization of the Medical Corps of the Army that will meet those defects that we suffered from during that time, and for that reason I am most heartily in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to use any more time.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

DRAINAGE OF SWAMP LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 19541, with the amendments recommended by the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to discharge the committee. Which bill does the gentleman desire to pass? Is it the bill with amendments or the bill pending before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill and consider it in the House, and pass it with the amendments recommended by the committee and an amendment I will send to the Speaker's desk, which I am authorized to offer.

The SPEAKER. Are they committee amendments?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They are committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. Reported by the committee?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the following bill and pass the same with committee amendments and with an amendment the gentleman sends up in addition. Is that correct?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. With an amendment I am authorized by the committee to offer.

The SPEAKER. Is it reported as a committee amendment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Then the motion is to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the committee amendments and an additional amendment. The Clerk will report the bill with the committee amendments and the additional amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19541) to authorize the drainage of certain lands in the State of Minnesota.

Be it enacted, etc., That all lands in the State of Minnesota, when subject to entry, and all entered lands for which no final certificates have issued, are hereby made and declared to be subject to all of the provisions of the laws of said State relating to the drainage of swamp or overflowed lands for agricultural purposes to the same extent and in the same manner in which lands of a like character held in private ownership are or may be subject to said laws: Provided, That the United States and all persons legally holding unpatented lands under entries made under the public-land laws of the United States are accorded all the rights, privileges, and benefits given by said laws to persons holding lands of a like character in private ownership.

SEC. 2. That the cost of constructing canals, ditches, and other drainage works incurred in connection with any drainage project under said laws shall be equitably apportioned among all lands held in private ownership, all lands covered by unpatented entries, and all unentered public lands affected by such project; and officially certified lists showing the amount of the charges assessed against each smallest legal subdivision of such lands shall be furnished to the register and receiver of the land district in which the lands affected are located as soon as said charges are assessed, but nothing in this act shall be construed as creating any obligation on the United States to pay any of said charges.

SEC. 3. That all charges legally assessed may be enforced against any unentered lands, or against any lands covered by an unpatented entry, by the sale of such lands subject to the same manner and under the same proceedings under which such charges would be enforced against lands held in private ownership.

SEC. 4. That when any unentered lands, or any lands covered by an unpatented entry, have been sold in the manner mentioned in this act, a statement of such sale showing the price at which each legal subdivision was sold shall be officially certified to the register and receiver immediately after the completion of such sale.

SEC. 5. That at any time after any sale of unentered lands has been made in the manner and for the purposes mentioned in this act patent shall issue to the purchaser thereof upon payment to the receiver of the minimum price of $1.25 per acre, or such other price as may have been fixed by law for such lands, together with the usual fees and commissions charged in entry of like lands under the homestead laws. But purchasers at a sale of unentered lands shall have the qualification of homestead entrymen, and not more than 160 acres of such lands shall be sold to any one purchaser under the provisions of this act. This limitation shall not apply to sales to the State, but shall apply to purchases from the State of unentered lands bid in for the State. Any part of the purchase money arising from the sale of any lands in the manner and for the purposes provided in this act which shall be in excess of the payments herein required and of the total drainage charges assessed against such lands shall also be paid to the receiver before patent is issued.

SEC. 6. That any unpatented lands sold in the manner and for the purposes mentioned in this act may be patented to the purchaser thereof at any time after the expiration of the period of redemption provided for in the drainage laws under which it may be sold (there having been no redemption) upon the payment to the receiver of the fees and commissions and the price mentioned in the preceding section, or so much thereof as has not already been paid by the entryman; and if the sum received at any such sale shall be in excess of the payments herein required and of the drainage assessments and cost of the sale, such excess shall be paid to the proper county officer for the benefit of and payment to the entryman.

SEC. 7. That a copy of all notices required by the drainage laws mentioned in this act to be given to the owners or occupants of lands held in private ownership shall, as soon as such notices issue, be delivered to the register and receiver of the proper district land office in cases where unentered lands are affected thereby and to the entryman whose unpatented lands are included therein, and the United States and such entrymen shall be given the same rights to be heard by petition, answer, remonstrance, appeal, or otherwise as are given to persons holding lands in private ownership; and all entrymen shall be given the same rights of redemption as are given to the owners of lands held in private ownership.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. A second is ordered under the rule. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, this act is sought for the purpose of giving the State of Minnesota an opportunity to drain lands belonging to the Government in the northern part of the State. It is not intended to have the National Government advance any money or to do any of the work of drainage, but to give the State authority to treat this land the same as privately owned land situated in the State. If this bill passes, the State will have authority to go on this land, cut the ditches necessary for purposes of drainage, and then charge the expenses of that drainage up to the land. This does not take away any opportunity to enter any of the lands affected or to prevent settlement upon the lands, but will aid in settling and disposing of them.

In case a drainage proceeding is started, there will be at least two years after initiation of the proceedings before there would be any sale of unentered land. If in the meantime that land is entered, the entryman will have in addition a period of three years after sale within which to redeem. It is the intention to treat this land just the same as privately owned land, with this exception, that whatever the National Government has the right to receive for this land under the present law must first be paid. We do not take away from the National Government anything or ask the National Government to part with anything. We simply ask authority to drain these lands that we may make use of them, making the charge for drainage a claim upon them. At the present time they are incapable of being used because of their swampy condition.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question or two? First, whether this land is Government land or whether it is owned by Indian tribes?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. These lands are partly Indian lands and partly Government lands, but the Indian title has been ceded to the National Government, with the arrangement that they are to be sold at $1.25 an acre for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The National Government holds the Indian title as trustee?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, now, does the swamp-land act of 1852, or did it not apply to the State of Minnesota? I do not remember the public-land history of Minnesota.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The swamp-land act applied except in this Indian reservation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. These lands are all in an Indian reservation?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This was in an Indian reservation; not all of it; there is some, a little, outside, but practically all of it is in the Indian reservation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand this bill simply subjects this land to the drainage laws of the State of Minnesota, in the same manner as lands of private owners are subject to the drainage laws, and before a patent shall issue from the Federal Government for the lands there must be at least $1.25 an acre and expense paid to the Federal Government?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; paid to the Federal Government. This will mean a good deal to the States, because there are in the vicinity 3,000,000 acres of land that is so swampy that it can not be used. There are about a million and a half acres that have not been entered at all, because nobody could make use of them for homes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit it, if I understand the bill correctly, it gives to the State of Minnesota the right to impose a tax or charge, as a lien, upon a part of the public domain?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. BONYNGE. No.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is, it charges the expenses of the drainage.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the State of Minnesota is to determine what those expenses are.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They are to be determined just the same as they would be as to any other lands in a drainage proceeding.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand. The fact remains it is a charge levied by the State upon the land owned by the United States. I asked that because the gentleman a moment ago said he asked nothing from the Federal Treasury. I understand, of course, that that is in a sense taking nothing from the Federal Treasury, but if these lands were not subjected to that charge, and you asked merely that the State of Minnesota might use them or have an easement over them for digging its ditches and perfecting its drainage work, they would be very much increased in value and the money from the increased value would ultimately come to the Federal Government.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; but we felt that it would not be fair for the people, who are nearly all of them poor, to tax their privately owned lands that might lie between these Government lands, and in that way increase the value of the national lands that are now open to settlement at $1.25 an acre.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If these national lands that are open to settlement could be improved and made good by drainage, as much as the private lands interspersed among them, why could they not now be entered and brought by their owners into the drainage system?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They can be entered under this law. That is, this law would not prevent them from being entered, even after the drainage project is started.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand, but if the interspersed privately owned lands are being improved, and could be improved and made tillable and valuable, that fact is known there; and why could not the people enter those lands and then go into these drainage associations. If profitable to present owners, why not profitable to enter lands in order to do so. I suppose you have territorial assessments for drainage purposes, do you not?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Similar to our levee districts. Why could not that be done? We have never asked that the levee districts should fix a charge upon the Federal lands.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I suppose the gentleman has in mind that this might mean the taking of lands in large tracts. That is not possible. The land which is affected by this bill is public land. Some of it has been entered, while other portions are so poor that they can not be entered. For instance, in one place there are twenty townships that are practically all one large swamp. Now, there are a number of entrymen in there, but those entrymen have been unable to make any payments. They have been unable to make any improvements, and Congress has extended the time within which they are required to make payments to the Indians. Unless we have some relief of this kind it is absolutely impossible for people to maintain themselves in that section if conditions remain anything like what they have been during the last six or eight years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One other question. Under the provisions of this bill, would or would not the State of Minnesota have a right, in case the charges fixed upon lands were not paid, to sell them in order to get the money?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They would have the right to sell them, and they would be sold at public auction.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. Now, that brings us to this, that we pass a bill which enables the State of Minnesota to sell at public auction lands which are a part of the public domain before they are subjected to private ownership.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, that is the question I asked you. Now, let me ask you again. Speaking of the lands that are a part of the public domain, is there any provision of this bill which permits them to be sold for the charges to be levied upon them under the bill by the State of Minnesota?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; but it is two years before there can be a sale after the drainage project is started. During that time there can be no question but that every foot of this land reclaimed by drainage will be taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose a section of this land were not entered within that time and the title still remained in the United States, then could that land be sold under this bill?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; but in any event it must be sold to a person who has the qualifications of a homesteader, and not more than 160 acres can be sold to any one person.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Is there a minimum price fixed?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. He must pay not less than $1.25 an acre, and the usual fees and commissions of homestead entrymen, in addition to the drainage charges.

Mr. SMALL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMALL. I desire to ask if, under section 3, there is not a provision that the land may be sold, that the drainage charges assessed against it must be paid, and if that is not an answer to the question of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; and that is limited by the amendment that I have sent to the Speaker's desk, which has been read, The amendment limits the sale of unentered lands to persons qualified as homesteaders in tracts of not more than 160 acres.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Still, you can sell the public domain, provided you do not sell it in blocks exceeding 160 acres, and you sell it to a person qualified as a homesteader?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Under charges fixed by the State on Federal property.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. How are you to collect the charges except by a scale?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We never could collect them if we could not do something of this kind. If you are willing to give us a chance to use these swamps, you must do it in some such way as this. If you want to preserve them for all time for the frogs, good and well; but it seems to me that here is an opportunity to furnish homes for 100,000 people. We are not asking near as much as the people that go upon the arid lands of the West. The National Government gives the work and advances the money to reclaim those lands. We do not ask that. We expect to go down into our own pockets to pay for it, and we will do it cheerfully if you will only give us the right.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As a matter of fact, if you put in this drainage system, you can not do it and reclaim the land without reclaiming the Federal land, so that there must be some provision to collect the charges.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Now, you provide that these lands may be sold at public sale to people who have the qualifications of homesteaders. Are they required to settle on it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No. If no one sees fit to settle on it after it is actually reclaimed it is not worth considering. Now, this feature has the recommendation of the Department of the Interior. It was thought that if settlement was required the counties would not be able to secure reimbursement for their drainage expenditures.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If no person qualified as a homesteader bids for the land, the lands are not sold?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; they still remain with the charges for reclamation against them. The State has a right to sell at private sale, but they must sell to people qualified as homesteaders, and they must sell in not more than 160-acre lots.

Mr. JONES of Washington. So that the Government will get every dollar due it, and the lands will be reclaimed?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Is that the fact? Where nobody bids, the State will make the sale; and is there a limit fixing the price so that the Government will get its $1.25?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; the provision is that no patent shall issue until that money has been paid—until the $1.25, or whatever the sum fixed, is paid. In some instances the price is as high as $4, because under the competitive system of bidding for certain lands the price was raised on some of this land to $4, and they would have to pay the $4 an acre, and in addition, pay the fees as the commissions.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There is no chance for the Government to lose this land without the price?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Not a chance at all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose some of this land is ditched, and you sell it, and no private person buys it, then what becomes of the land?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The State has to buy it in.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The charge remains against it, but the State would bid it in and would hold it subject to this provision that it must sell.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. With interest accumulating on it all the time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If it can not sell it at public sale, it probably could sell it for the full amount, but would have to discount and lose a part of the amount that it has advanced for the purpose of digging those ditches.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much is this land worth unditched?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Absolutely worthless, most of it. So worthless that some of it has remained there for forty years unentered.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Some people are living on this land?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No and yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are there no people living near it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Near some of it. On much a person can not go on it and make a home.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understood somebody to say that there were intermediate owners.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There are in some places.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In some places, then, there are settlers on this land.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. On some of it. There are a million and a half acres at least that no settler has gone on, and it has been opened some of it for forty years and other parts for fifteen years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. When they have the ditch as contemplated what will it be worth per acre?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It will be worth what they make it. If it is completely drained it will in a few years be worth probably fifteen or twenty dollars per acre or even higher.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman is conversant with this. In his judgment about how much value is added to this land by the ditching?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I wish to reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to get that question answered. How much does the ditching of the land add to its value?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That depends entirely upon the circumstances.

Mr. REEDER. It is worth nothing before it is ditched.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If this land had not been created into an Indian reservation prior to the admission of Minnesota into the Union, every acre of it would have gone to the State of Minnesota under the swamp-lands grant of 1852 anyway.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; we would have got it all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Got the fee simple title.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; but it happened to be inside of an Indian reservation, and we did not get it for that reason. I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill was favorably recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and has the unanimous report of the Committee on Public Lands. A majority of these lands are located in my district. They were formerly a part of what is known as the Red Lake Reservation. They were ceded to the United States Government in trust to be disposed of under the homestead law, some at $1.25 an acre and some at $4 an acre. Outside of that money, which goes to the Indians, the United States has no interest whatever. The United States can not make any money out of them. It was impossible to do any more than to raise enough money to pay the Indians. The Indians will never get their money unless some system is adopted to improve and reclaim these lands so they can be sold. There are, as has been stated, perhaps a million and a half acres that have been open to settlement at $1.25 an acre for fifteen years, and some at $4 per acre have been open to sale for four years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask the gentleman what proportion of these lands belong to the Government and what proportion to the Indian tribes?

Mr. STEENERSON. The lands all belong to the Indian tribes, and were ceded to the United States, as I said, in trust, and the swamp-land act never applied to the Red Lake Reservation. Consequently these swamp lands passed to the United States in trust, to be disposed of under the homestead law. If the swamp-land act had applied to this reservation, the State of Minnesota would have every foot of this land in fee under the swamp-land grant, but it did not attach; it was so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and therefore we have this situation. There are thousands of acres now unfit for cultivation because of swamp. There are a few tracts interspersed between them that were fit to be settled upon, and were settled upon by settlers who paid $1.25 an acre, and some $4 an acre; but the situation confronting them was that a majority of these lands could not be assessed because they are Government lands. You could not extend the drainage improvements against them, and consequently all drainage improvements failed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it timber land?

Mr. STEENERSON. There is no timber——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield two minutes longer to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What sort of timber is on this land?

Mr. STEENERSON. There is no timber on any of this land, except possibly a few scattered poplar groves. All this ceded land is classified by the United States Government as timber and agricultural land, but the timber has been sold, or will be sold, under the law that enables the purchaser to cut off the timber, and when it is cut off it is subject to homestead entry and the homesteader gets the land, stripped of the timber, and pays $1.25 an acre——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But the bill alludes to pine land——

Mr. STEENERSON. Pine land where stumpage has been sold and the money gone to the Indians, and the land on which the stumps stand is subject to entry under the homestead law. That is the only pine land there is.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The pine land has been eliminated.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who gets that?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is not subject to entry under this.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who will own it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The United States Government.

Mr. STEENERSON. I want to emphasize the fact that the United States has no interest in these lands whatever, except to see that they are disposed of to settlers. They could in no event, whether this law is passed or not, make any money out of it, except to pay the Indians, and the Indians will never get any money unless such a law be passed or the Government should undertake the reclamation directly, as I preferred, to drain it and make it valuable.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question? There are a number of propositions now pending in this House looking to the use of public lands for drainage purposes along the line adopted in the Reclamation Service?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. This bill, I understand, in nowise effects the title to land so as to prevent it from becoming a part of this drainage fund proposed to be created by the pending bills?

Mr. STEENERSON. Not at all. These lands were not——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield the gentleman one minute additional.

Mr. STEENERSON. The lands provided for in the bill to which the gentleman refers are other lands. They are not these lands and it would not affect these, although, as I already said, I should have preferred to have the Government take the drainage of these lands directly, but this Congress will not do that, so the only thing left to do is to enable the State to include these lands in drainage districts and make assessments for drainage applicable to these lands, and thereby the whole country can be developed and settled upon. There is no possible chance for speculation.

Mr. LEAKE. What proportion of these lands included in the drainage area is composed of lands owned by the Government and lands owned by private individuals?

Mr. STEENERSON. A large majority of the land is owned by the Government in trust for the Indians.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Do I understand the gentleman from Mississippi to yield any further time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that any further time is asked. Mr. Speaker, this is a strong but not singular illustration of the viciousness and unwisdom of the special rule under which we are working. Legislation is hurried before Members of the House, without any opportunity to amend a pending bill, and yet a mere majority is sufficient to pass it. I have tried the best I could to get some knowledge of the provisions of the bill, and I had to ask a Member to loan one to me, because the bill was not around upon the desks of Members, so I have tried to get information on the bill by inquiry of the gentleman in charge of it. I have no hesitancy in saying I would rather a great deal vote for a bill to donate these lands outright to the State of Minnesota and let Minnesota get out of them what she can, the Federal Government paying the Indians, where the Indians own the land, the upset price of $1.25 an acre, and letting Minnesota pay that amount back to the Federal Government.

This bill involves a strange mixing up—a veritable jumbling—of sovereignties. The gentleman says that the United States Government does not own the land, but the title is in the United States Government for the benefit of these Indian tribes, and here is a bill under which the lands belonging to the United States Government as legal owner and belonging to the Indian tribes as beneficiaries can be sold by the State of Minnesota, and the State of Minnesota can buy the lands in.

Mr. STEENERSON. Subject to the money——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand; subject to a theoretical right of the Indians to get their money back. But the upshot of it all is that the State of Minnesota can make itself the owner of the lands, while the Indians may lose the lands. It is a strange mixture of sovereignties involved in an idea of a State tax and weighting with State charges Federal property.

Mr. TAWNEY. My colleague [Mr. VOLSTEAD] wants to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word. It is a strange mixing up of sovereignties whereby a State charges with a lien land belonging to the United States, in so far as the title is concerned, at any rate—it makes no difference who are the beneficiaries—charges it with a State territorial assessment or tax, and can sell those lands to others, or in default of a sufficient amount realized on sale, to pay back $1.25, plus the charge of drainage, can itself become the owner of the land. That is all of it in a nutshell, as I understand it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The State of Minnesota can not acquire title under its laws. The State can bid them in to preserve the lien, but it does not acquire title. It can assign or sell its right to a party who has the qualification of a homestead entryman, but before that party can secure title he must pay to the Federal Government $1.25 an acre and commission fees.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The State of Minnesota simply holds it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that, and that is the reason I said a moment ago that in a certain sort of theoretical way the Government or Indian was protected, but if the lands were worth $1.25, plus the drainage charges, the State would not have had to buy them in, even as a trustee or in any other way. Meanwhile the Indians have lost them. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is not the sort of a bill to be passed in this way. I note also an absence of any reservation of mineral right, if there should be any, in connection with these lands. Whether there are or not, it is usual to put that reservation in these bills, and it is absent from this one.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will my colleague let me ask him a question? The gentleman says that in the meantime the Indians will have lost them. Just what does he mean by that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I mean by that that the title will have passed out of the United States Government, as I have said, for the Indian tribes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Let me ask the gentleman just one other question. When the title passes out of the Federal Government there must be $1.25 go into the Federal Government at the same time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Where and how and when?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One dollar and twenty-five cents goes into the Federal Treasury, provided the lands sell for $1.25 plus the drainage charge.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But if they do not sell for $1.25 plus the drainage charge, then nothing goes into the United States Treasury. The drainage charge constitutes a first lien. The State of Minnesota is not obliged to buy them in.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. May I call your attention to this: Under the law of our State if the land does not sell for enough the State must bid it in, and the State to get its drainage money out of it must sell it, and the man that gets it must pay the United States Government $1.25 for the land.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, stop a minute. The gentleman says if the State gets it the State must sell it, and the State must sell it so as to get the drainage charges out of it, and after which get the $1.25 for the Federal Government. Now, the preferential charge upon the land is the drainage charge, and the State is to get that, and then the Federal Government is to get $1.25 afterwards if it can—that is, if the land sells for enough to pay $1.25 plus the drainage charge, and there is no limit of the amount per acre of the drainage charge. It is like improving a ward or orphan out of his property.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If it is not worth enough so that the National Government can get its drainage charge, it must sell for less, because the man who buys must pay the National Government for that land.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But suppose the State of Minnesota sells it afterwards for only 50 cents an acre; what becomes of the 50 cents?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If it sells it for 50 cents an acre, the man that buys must to get title go to the Government of the United States and pay the $1.25 an acre before he gets a patent from the United States. He can not get a foot of this land without paying the Government of the United States first.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What part of the bill justifies that statement? Read it, please.

Mr. VOLSTEAD:

At any time after any sale of unentered lands has been made in the manner and for the purposes mentioned in this act patents shall issue to the purchaser thereof upon payment to the receiver of the minimum price of $1.25 per acre or such other price as may have been fixed by law for such lands, together with the usual fees and commissions charged in entry of like lands under the homestead laws.

Before a man can obtain any of this land he must pay the Government what is due the Indians and due the National Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman thinks that bears that construction?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Why, that is what it is put in there for; and there is another provision later on in the bill, in reference to entered land, making a similar provision.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The State can bid in large quantities of this land. Let us say it is 15,000 acres, and upon 10 of the 15,000 acres let us say that a large profit is made, while upon the other 5,000 acres there is a loss. The State has made its profit on the whole transaction.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Let me say that the State can not make a profit, because this bill provides that if there is an excess it shall go to the National Government and not to the State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand; but the State has made an enormous profit by the improvements of its land——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. But we must pay for that.

Mr. WILLIAMS (continuing). And by the improvement of land in private ownership, and every other way, by the building up of the country and its cities. It seems to me it would be much plainer, and I would have less objection to it, to come in with a bill to donate these swamp lands to the State of Minnesota. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see this policy begin to prevail about the public lands; in any State where they are reduced to a small amount, as they are in Minnesota and in my own State, and others, where they are swamp lands or otherwise not valuable lands, the less valuable lands (which they must be or they would have been entered long ago), that they be turned over to the State, and the land offices there and their expenses be abolished. This is an illustration which should discourage the House from the consideration of legislation that is important, under suspension by bare majority, without opportunity of amendment being offered, under the present special rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to inquire if these lands are certain Indian lands that were opened for settlement? If I recollect, a provision of the act under which they were opened up provides that these lands should be sold under sealed bids for a minimum price fixed for a certain number of years—five, I think, is the usual period. If the lands were not sold for that they should then be disposed of to the highest bidder, without regard to the minimum price. Is the gentleman able to state whether the act opening the land occupied by the Chippewas for settlement contained that provision?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The minimum is $1.25 per acre.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Can the gentleman state whether or not that act does contain that provision?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The minimum is $1.25.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman states that there is a provision by which, if the minimum can not be obtained, these lands shall be sold.

Mr. STEENERSON. The minimum in that case was $4.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Suppose it could not be sold for the minimum, whatever it was sold for should be turned over to the Indians. Is that provision in this bill?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Under this bill it must be sold for not less than $1.25 an acre. It must sell for the price fixed by law, not less than for $1.25 an acre. If it sells for more, the excess also goes to the Indians.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It can not be sold for less than the minimum?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I am ordinarily in favor of the reclamation of swamp lands; but if all the purposes outlined and described could be accomplished by this bill, there is still a basic objection to it which has been touched upon by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

There are two classes of lands embodied in this bill: Lands held in trust by the United States for the Indians and public lands in which the absolute title is held by the United States. Now, as I say, if the purposes of the bill could be accomplished as outlined by its author, the gentleman from Minnesota, I think it is defective in that it provides a mixed ownership, and will result in complications. Now, presumably it is the intention——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from North Carolina permit a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you think there is any more likelihood of complication or difficulty arising out of this than there would be if this drainage plan is not adopted? If it is not adopted, neither the Government lands nor the State lands around the Government lands will be of any value whatever, and without this plan either the Government must adopt a general drainage scheme there, including the State lands, or the State must adopt a general drainage plan, including the Government lands. Otherwise the land will continue worthless. In this way the Government will secure the drainage of its lands without any expense to it, not even any expense for administration.

Mr. SMALL. Yes; that is the proposition; but the question is whether it can be carried out by this bill, and if it can be, whether it ought to be. I submit it is a vicious proposition for the United States to permit any of the lands it owns, in trust or absolutely, to go into partnership with any drainage association, by which the land shall be drained and an absolute lien created upon it, and, as provided in this bill, the land be sold for the purpose of enforcing that lien.

Now, there is a provision in the bill here that all the drainage charges shall be a lien upon the land and give the right to sell it under the drainage laws of the State of Minnesota.

Mr. REEDER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; for a question.

Mr. REEDER. I should like to ask how it is possible for this land to be of any value when the Government will not transfer the title without the payment of $1.25 an acre?

Mr. SMALL. Then it is of value to somebody. It is of value to the United States, or to the drainage association which has put its money into the drainage of the land. If by any means, through the machinery of this bill, the drainage association should be deprived of its money, then it is a vicious bill; and if the Government of the United States should be deprived of its rights, either absolutely or those which it holds in trust, then it is also a vicious bill; and I say that the viciousness of it exists in this: That it creates a condition in which the United States holds a title upon the one part and the drainage association holds a lien upon the other; and if that lien is enforced, then you have an owner, a citizen of the State of Minnesota or elsewhere, claiming title to the land, subject to the right of the United States to receive its dollar and a quarter before it will issue a patent to that purchaser. Therefore you have this condition: One person claiming the title to the land and a certain conditional title upon the part of the United States, and that is a vicious condition which ought not to exist and which ought not to be created by any law of Congress.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Is not the same thing true so far as the Reclamation Service out West is concerned?

Mr. SMALL. I do not understand that any such condition as that applies to the reclamation of arid lands. There the United States expends the money which comes from the proceeds of public lands, expends the money of the United States, and having expended it and reclaimed those lands, then they become open to settlement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No other sovereignty charges the land with a lien.

Mr. SMALL. That is correct.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is it not better for the Government to submit these lands to this drainage charge as long as its only interest is to secure the money that is due to the Indians, than to let the lands remain useless forever? Does the gentleman know that they have been open to settlement for eighteen years without anybody wanting to take them?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains on this side?

The SPEAKER. None. It is all exhausted. The question is on suspending the rules, agreeing to the committee amendments and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, and passing the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Pending that, I move that the House do now take a recess until 11.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will lay before the House, pending that motion, a personal request.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. STURGISS, for one week, on account of important business.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the reference of the bill S. 5337, an act for the relief of Mates William Jenney, William W. Beck, Thomas W. Bonsall, William Boyd, John Griffin, James Hill, Frank Holler, Robert Robinson, and Silas T. C. Smith, United States Navy, retired, who have been placed on the retired list with the rank and pay of one grade above that actually held by them at the time of retirement, was changed from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RECESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the House take a recess until to-morrow at 11.30 a. m.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I call for a division by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 124, nays 83, answered "present" 11, not voting 169, as follows:

CROW INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. CLAPP. I present a copy of the hearing before the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate on the bill (S. 2087) to incorporate a company for breeding horses on the Crow Indian Reservation, Mont., and for other purposes, and the bill (S. 2963) for the survey and allotment of Indian lands now embraced within the limits of the Crow Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment. The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the naval appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments of the committee be taken up in their order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered, in their order. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, as the bill is before the Senate, I do not propose to go on with it, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] has given notice that he desires to address the Senate this morning, and he tells me that he is ready to submit his remarks. Therefore I give way to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WARREN. One moment, before the Senator puts the bill aside.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator knows, the bill has not been before us sufficiently long for a very thorough examination. I have an amendment which, if the Senator is willing, I should like to offer now. I intended to bring it to his notice when the bill was in committee. With his permission, I will send the amendment to the desk and ask that it be printed.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

Mr. WARNER. I ask the Chair to lay Senate bill No. 6206 before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6206) for the relief of certain former members of the Twenty-fifth Regiment of United States Infantry.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WARNER. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. Before the Senator from Missouri begins to speak, and not knowing whether this particular matter is covered by his speech, with the Senator's permission, I should like to ask him to state, if he cares to do so, after an examination of the records in this case, how many of the members of this battalion, to the best of his judgment, participated in the affray. I make the request that it may be a part of the record in this case.

Mr. WARNER. My judgment, Mr. President, would be that there were from eight to fifteen.

Mr. CLAPP. Has the Senator, after his investigation of the case, reached the point where he would care to express an opinion as to how many members of the battalion, in his judgment, outside of those who participated in the affray itself, were cognizant, either before or after the affray, as to the participants in it.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, that certain members of the battalion were accessories before and certain other members after the fact, in my judgment, there can be no question. But I can not give or attempt to give an accurate number of such.

Mr. CLAPP. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, by its resolution the Senate instructed the Committee on Military Affairs to take and have printed testimony for the purpose of ascertaining all the facts with reference to, or connected with, the affray at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906, "without questioning the legality or justice of any act of the President in relation thereto." This resolution was framed after an exhaustive discussion was had in this Chamber as to the constitutional powers of the President, as Commander in Chief, summarily to terminate the term of enlistment of an enlisted man by discharge, with or "without honor." And as a result of that discussion the phrase "without questioning the legality or justice of any act of the President," was inserted in the resolution.

An examination of the RECORD will show that on the 19th day of December the senior Senator from Ohio submitted to the Senate resolutions as follows:

Resolved, That if the Committee on Military Affairs deem it necessary, in connection with the consideration of the President in response to resolutions Nos. 180 and 181, to take further testimony to establish all facts connected with the discharge of the members of Companies B, C, and D, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, that it be, and hereby is, authorized to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

This resolution was modified, from time to time, until on the 17th day of January, 1907, a Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Blackburn, submitted an amendment to insert in line 1, after the words "Resolved, That," the following:

without questioning or denying the legal right of the President to discharge without honor enlisted men from the Army of the United States.

So that the resolution, when amended, would read:

Resolved, That, without questioning or denying the legal right of the President to discharge without honor enlisted men from the Army of the United States, the Committee on Military Affairs is hereby authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to take and have printed testimony for the purpose of ascertaining all the facts with reference to, or connected with, the affray at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906. Said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, and administer oaths, to sit during sessions of the Senate, and, if deemed advisable, at Brownsville or elsewhere; the expense of the investigation to be paid for from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Four days thereafter the Senator from Ohio modified his resolution, so that the Senate, "without questioning the legality or justice of any act of the President," empowered the Committee on Military Affairs, "to ascertain all the facts with reference to or connected with the affray at Brownsville." The resolution in full is as follows:

Resolved, That, without questioning the legality or justice of any act of the President in relation thereto, the Committee on Military Affairs is hereby authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to take and have printed testimony for the purpose of ascertaining all the facts with reference to, or connected with, the affray at Brownsville, Tex., on the night of August 13–14, 1906. Said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to sit during sessions or recess of the Senate, and, if deemed advisable, at Brownsville or elsewhere; the expense of the investigation to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The supporters of this resolution are, I submit, estopped from challenging either the legality or the justice of the President's order in discharging "without honor" the soldiers of Companies B, C, and D, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, if this solemn resolution of the Senate, reached after long and careful debate, is to be taken seriously as reflecting the deliberate judgment of this body.

The question of fact whether or not members of those companies participated in the Brownsville affray should be answered without prejudice, either in favor of or against them, by reason of their race or color, and it is to be regretted that a studious and systematic effort has been made to arouse the race feeling of the negroes of the country against the President because of his action with reference to those companies.

Those who thus seek to arouse a race issue have taken upon themselves a heavy responsibility, for their action must necessarily serve to increase the race prejudice which now exists to an unfortunate extent. It is incredible to me that any intelligent man, white or black, should have the hardihood to charge that the President, in issuing the order discharging those soldiers, was influenced against them by reason of their color. Before I could believe that his action was inspired by hostility to the colored race all his official accomplishments would have to be undone, and all his declarations unsaid. In the nation's history no President has been more emphatic in his declarations and in his actions looking to the equal protection of the negro under the law than the present occupant of the White House.

In his message of December 19, 1906, on the Brownsville affray, he says:

It is of the utmost importance to all our people that we shall deal with each man on his merits as a man, and not deal with him merely as a member of a given race; that we shall judge each man by his conduct and not by his color. This is important for the white man, and it is far more important for the colored man. More evil and sinister counsel never was given to any people than that given to colored men by those advisers, whether black or white, who, by apology and condonation, encourage conduct such as that of the three companies in question. If the colored men elect to stand by criminals of their own race because they are of their own race, they assuredly lay up for themselves the most dreadful day of reckoning. Every farsighted friend of the colored race in its efforts to strive onward and upward, should teach first, as the most important blessing alike to the white men and the black, the duty of treating the individual man strictly on his worth as he shows it. Any conduct by colored people which tends to substitute for this rule the rule of standing by and shielding an evil doer because he is a member of their race, means the inevitable degradation of the colored race. It may and probably does mean damage to the white race, but it means ruin to the black race.

By the rule thus aptly stated, the evidence as to the midnight assault upon the people of Brownsville should be weighed upon the scales of justice, evenly balanced to every man wearing the uniform of a United States soldier.

Mr. President, before entering upon a discussion of the evidence before the committee, and by it submitted to the Senate, I desire to go upon record as not sharing in the adverse criticism of the Administration for sending negro troops to garrison Fort Brown. Men who are good enough to wear the uniform of United States soldiers are good enough to serve their country wherever the flag floats. And, Mr. President, I cheerfully join with the Senator from Ohio in paying a tribute to the negro as a soldier.

The negro, in all the intervening years since the blood of Crispus Attucks, a martyr to American liberty, stained the streets of Boston, has by his courage in battle earned the right to stand up and be counted a man. He has shared the privations of the camp, the hardships of the march, and the dangers of the battle with a patience, endurance, and courage equal to that of his white comrade. And whenever given the opportunity he has been ready to fight the battles of his country. In the war of 1812 no troops did better service than the Louisiana colored volunteers who were called into service by the ever memorable address to them by General Jackson. A part of the address I read:

HEADQUARTERS SEVENTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
Mobile, September 21, 1814.

To the free colored inhabitants of Louisiana:

Through a mistaken policy you have heretofore been deprived of a participation in the glorious struggle for national rights in which our country is engaged. This no longer shall exist.

As sons of freedom you are now called upon to defend our most inestimable blessings. As Americans, your country looks with confidence to her adopted children for a valorous support, as a faithful return for the advantages enjoyed under her mild and equitable government. As fathers, husbands, and brothers, you are summoned to rally around the standard of the Eagle, to defend all which is dear to existence.

Your country, although calling for your exertions, does not wish you to engage in her cause without remunerating you for the services rendered. Your intelligent minds are not to be led away by false representations—your love of honor would cause you to despise the men who should attempt to deceive you. With sincerity of a soldier and in the language of truth I address you.

In response to this stirring appeal the freemen of Louisiana quickly responded; they rallied to the "Standard of the Eagle;" their soldierly qualities won from General Jackson as high a tribute as was ever paid "by a military chief" to his soldiers. In an address to them on December 18, 1814, he said:

Soldiers: When, on the banks of the Mobile, I called you to take up arms, inviting you to partake the perils and glory of your white fellow citizens, I expected much from you; for I was not ignorant that you possessed qualities most formidable to an invading enemy. I knew with what fortitude you could endure hunger and thirst, and all the fatigues of a campaign. I knew well how you loved your native country, and that you, as well as ourselves, had to defend what man holds most dear—his parents, wife, children, and property. You have done more than I expected. In addition to the previous qualities I before knew you to possess, I found among you a noble enthusiasm, which leads to the performance of great things.

Soldiers: The President of the United States shall hear how praiseworthy was your conduct in the hour of danger, and the representatives of the American people will give you the praise your exploits entitle you to. Your general anticipates them in applauding your noble ardor.

The enemy approaches; his vessels cover our lakes; our brave citizens are united, and all contention has ceased among them. Their only dispute is, who shall win the prize of valor, or who the most glory, its noblest reward.

In the battle of New Orleans, which followed in a few days thereafter, no regiments did better service than did the black regiments. In that battle they won "the prize of honor."

In the civil war, the greatest of all wars of modern times, no soldiers displayed greater courage than did the negro troops. As evidence of their stubborn resistance permit me to call the attention of the Senate to two or three of the many notable instances that might be given.

At Milliken's Bend (July 7, 1863) the Ninth Louisiana black regiment lost, in battle, in killed and wounded, 64 per cent of the men it took into action.

Again, at Chapin's Farm (September 29, 1864) the lost in battle of the Sixth United States Colored Regiment was 57 per cent, the killed and wounded of these regiments on the battlefield far exceeding the loss of the light brigade in its charge at Balaklava, a charge at which "all the world wondered"—a charge which has been immortalized in verse; yet in that charge the loss in killed and wounded was but 38 per cent.

And what regiment, sir, rendered more conspicuous service in the Spanish-American war than did the Tenth United States Cavalry (colored) at Santiago?

Mr. President, in the war of 1861–1865 I served in the same command with negro troops. The surviving veterans of those troops wear with me, as comrades, the button of the Grand Army of the Republic, and certain it is I have no prejudice against negro soldiers, and am not prepared to cry out against negroes as soldiers because I believe that members of the Twenty-fifth Infantry at Brownsville disgraced the uniform and stained the honorable record of their race as soldiers. Lawlessness is not a distinguishing characteristic of any race or color.

Mr. President, in the investigation of the Brownsville affray, extending through months, I have endeavored to weigh the evidence with the sole view of doing even-handed justice to the soldiers of Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, and guided by this rule I am driven to the conclusion that members of those companies whose identity has not been shown made the midnight assault on the sleeping and helpless citizens of Brownsville.

At the outset I deem it proper to call to the attention of the Senate the documentary evidence before the committee which led the President to issue the order discharging "without honor" the soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry who were present at Fort Brown on the night of the assault.

The first official knowledge coming to the President of that unfortunate affray was a telegram under date of August 15–16, 1906, conveying the report of the citizens' committee. It reads:

The undersigned, a committee of citizens, appointed at and by a mass meeting of the people of Brownsville, held in the Federal courthouse in this city, on Tuesday, the 14th instant, to investigate the attack made on the city by negro troops stationed at Fort Brown, adjoining the city, after an almost continuous session of two days find as follows:

"That at a few moments before midnight on Monday, the 13th, a body of United States soldiers of Twenty-fifth United States Infantry (colored), numbering between twenty and thirty men, emerged from the garrison inclosure, carrying their rifles and abundant supply of ammunition, and also began firing in town and directly into dwellings, offices, stores, and at police and citizens. During this firing one citizen, Frank Natus, was killed in his yard, and the lieutenant of police, who rode toward the firing, had his horse killed under him, and was shot through the right arm, which has since been amputated at the elbow. After firing about two hundred shots the soldiers retired to their quarters. After the most diligent inquiry we find that no shots were fired from the town into or toward the garrison, nor any provocation given for the attack. We find that negro soldiers who had been stationed here only a few weeks have taken exception to the fact that they have been refused liquor in the saloons at the same bars or counters as the white citizens, and that a few days ago a negro soldier was knocked down for rudely jostling a white woman, the wife of a Federal officer, off the sidewalk."

This telegram bore the following signatures:

John Bartlett, county judge; Frank W. Kibe, city attorney; Celedonce Garza, sheriff; E. H. Goodrich, superintendent public instruction; George Conner, chief of police; John G. Fernandez, banker; Frederick J. Combe, mayor; James A. Brown, alderman; J. H. Florence, State quarantine officer; J. O. Wheeler, editor Daily Herald; William Kelly, chairman citizens' committee.

The committee making this report, as shown by the evidence, was composed of the best men of Brownsville; its chairman, Capt. William Kelly, one of Brownsville's oldest and most respected citizens, a civil war veteran of the Union Army, a companion of the Loyal Legion, and a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, having commanded a colored company at Appomattox, having, as he testified, no prejudice against colored soldiers, but regarding them as good soldiers as were in the Army, when properly officered.

Following the report of the citizens' committee came to the President, through the Military Secretary, a telegram from Major Penrose, commander of the colored battalion, under date of August 16, two days after the shooting, as follows:

Reference your telegram yesterday, a shooting occurred in Brownsville about 12.10 morning of 14th, in which one civilian was killed and the chief of police wounded in right arm, which had to be amputated. Believe shooting was done by enlisted men of this post, but have not as yet been able to detect guilty party. Am conducting most thorough investigation possible and working in perfect harmony with citizens committee and mayor of Brownsville. Guard of one-third of garrison, one company, constantly on duty. All enlisted men confined strictly to post, and no one allowed to enter but mayor, member of citizens' committee, and those having official business. Conditions well in hand by both mayor and myself. No trouble since shooting, and anticipate none. Full facts reported to department commander by wire and mail.

From this report it will be seen that Major Penrose concurred with the citizens' committee in the conviction that soldiers of his command were guilty of the shooting. Nor did he, at any time before his court-martial, seven months after the affray, express a doubt as to their guilt.

In his report to the Military Secretary of the Department of Texas, under date of August 15, 1906, Major Penrose stated that when Doctor Combe, the mayor of Brownsville, called upon him about 2 a. m. the morning of the attack, claiming that the killing of a citizen and wounding of the lieutenant of police had "been by soldiers" he then felt confident that the mayor was mistaken, as all his men had been reported "present or accounted for;" but he says:

The mayor again called upon me about 10 a. m. (August 14) and informed me a few empty cartridge cases and used clips for our Springfield rifle had been found in the streets, and later in the morning told me there had been picked up between seventy-five and a hundred empty cases and used clips, as well as a few cartridges that had not been fired. Some of these I examined, and there is no doubt they are those manufactured by our Ordnance Department and issued to the troops.

* * * * * * *

Here it will be well for me to state that Doctor Combe served as a volunteer surgeon during the Spanish-American war; was a brigade surgeon during the greater part of the Philippine insurrection; and is at the present time employed to attend the sick of the post during the absence of the surgeon.

* * * * * * *

Were it not for the damaging evidence of the empty shells and used clips I should be of the firm belief that none of my men was in any way connected with the crime, but with this fact so painfully before me I am not only convinced it was perpetrated by men of this command, but that it was carefully planned beforehand. I have the affidavits from three noncommissioned officers who were in charge of quarters on the day and night, and they swear positively the rifles were verified and the racks locked after drill (practice march of Companies B and D, drill of Company C) and the old guard returned to the quarters, that they never left the quarters, and that the keys to the locks of the racks were never out of their possession, and that the racks were not opened until call to arms sounded, and were then opened by them.

From testimony gathered by the citizens' committee and given to me by Doctor Combe, I believe from seven to ten men were implicated in this matter. Some one of them must have had a key to the gun rack, and after check roll call was taken—for all were reported present at 11 p. m. roll call—they slipped out of quarters, did the shooting, returned while the companies were forming, and at some time during the early hours of the morning cleaned their rifles. This is made possible from the fact that the shooting all occurred within two short blocks of the barracks.

I am conducting the most rigid examination possible, examining every man, and working in conjunction with the citizens' committee, and I believe the offenders will be apprehended, although it will take time. The best of the men are very much perturbed over the matter, and I believe through them rather than my own efforts the perpetrators of this wanton crime will be apprehended.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WARNER. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Is the statement which the Senator is reading, that they cleaned their rifles, the statement of the officer?

Mr. WARNER. Yes; I am reading from the statement of Major Penrose, for the purpose of showing what was thought by the man who is supposed to know the time it would take, the man of all men in the United States who was most interested in protecting the good name of his command. Major Penrose further says:

That the enlisted men have been subjected to indignity since their arrival here there can be no doubt, and this has caused a good deal of feeling among them, and to one case I attribute this outbreak, the subject of which I will make an official report as soon as the collector of customs, Mr. Vann, returns to the city.

Before making his report, Major Penrose had examined noncommissioned officers and many of the enlisted men of the battalion, each of whom denied that he was either a party to, or had any knowledge of, any member of the command being engaged in the shooting. More than that, Major Penrose then knew from the company officers of the inspection that had been made of the guns and ammunition on the morning following the shooting. He also knew of the roll call that had been made, and he knew the opportunity, or lack of opportunity, afforded those engaged in the shooting of getting back into the fort and joining their companies unobserved by their officers. In fact he had before him all the facts and circumstances attending the midnight assault, and, animated no doubt—as every officer should be—with the laudable desire to defend the good name of the soldiers of his command, and to clear them, if possible, of the charge of midnight assassination—he reported—

I am not only convinced it [the shooting] was perpetrated by men of this command, but that it was carefully planned beforehand.

And further—

from testimony gathered by the citizens' committee and given to me by Doctor Combe, I believe from seven to ten men were implicated in this matter. Some one of them must have had a key to the gun rack and after check roll call was taken—for all were reported present at 11.30 p. m. roll call—they slipped out of quarters, did the shooting, returned while the companies were forming, and at some time during the early hours of the morning cleaned their rifles. This is made possible from the fact that the shooting all occurred within two short blocks of the barracks.

Yet the President (having this report before him), that he might be further advised of the facts, ordered Major Blocksom, an experienced Inspector-General of the Army, to Brownsville, to investigate the affray and report his findings to the War Department. That officer, on the 20th day of August (two days after his arrival in Brownsville), wired to The Military Secretary, United States Army, as follows:

Causes of disturbances are racial. People did not desire colored troops here, and showed they thought them inferior socially by certain slights and denials of privileges at public bars, etc. Soldiers resented this. There were several individual encounters between soldiers and citizens. About midnight of 13th, party of soldiers, probably 9 to 15, made raid through several squares of town, firing 75 to 150 shots, killing a bartender and dangerously wounding a lieutenant of police. They also fired into several houses, where women and children narrowly escaped being shot. Raid lasted from 8 to 10 minutes. Claim made that citizens fired first, but, I believe, without foundation. Although act probably preconcerted, do not think commanding officer could have foreseen. Citizens can not identify individual raiders, and authorities have made no demand for them. Investigation now going on has as yet discovered none. Commanding officer to-day invited a committee of three citizens to assist in conducting investigation. People are still in a state of great nervous tension, and men nearly all carry arms openly at night. Women and children still frightened. I consider it necessary to remove colored troops—sooner the better. While now apparently under perfect control, an entire company is on guard each day—a great strain with little prospect of relief. Differences between soldiers and citizens are irreconcilable. Suspected men might get a fair trial here at hands of civil authorities, but could not be properly protected from mob violence. Fuller report about investigation will be made in regular course.

Major Blocksom, after an exhaustive investigation extending through ten days, reported to the Military Secretary the result of his labors. The report as to the facts, as he found them, as to the shooting and the occurrences leading up to it, in statement is impartial and in tone judicial. I have read and reread it. I saw Major Blocksom upon the witness stand, and certain it is there is nothing in the report and nothing that he said upon the witness stand that would indicate to me at least that he was prejudiced against these men because of their color.

After being at Brownsville a week, Major Blocksom made a full report under date of August 29, 1906, in which, among other things, he says:

BROWNSVILLE, TEX., August 29, 1906.

SIR: I have the honor to report investigation of trouble caused by soldiers of Twenty-fifth Infantry, midnight August 13. I arrived at Brownsville the night of August 18.

* * * * * * *

I examined privately the five officers present when trouble occurred (Major Penrose, Captains Lyon and Macklin, Lieutenants Grier and Lawrason, all of the Twenty-fifth Infantry) all men who made affidavits, etc., A" to F" (as well as post noncommissioned staff, a number of old noncommissioned officers in each company, etc.), all important witnesses in A"' to B"' Mayor Combe, Mr. Dominguez, Mr. and Mrs. Evans, etc. I interviewed nearly all prominent officials—Federal, State, and county—saloon keepers, and other citizens of all classes. I examined the houses, interviewing inmates, of Messrs. Cowan, Rendall, Starck, and Yturria, observing where shots entered and left; also saloon where bartender was killed, and a number of other buildings having bullet marks.

The committee invited by Major Penrose to investigate (referred to in D') practically delegated its authority to Captain McDonald, of State Rangers, who is also a detective. He was given every assistance by the commanding officer. He served the warrants the first time.

And after all this examination, talking with the officers, mixing with the citizens, examining the buildings that had been fired into, he reports:

CAUSES.

First. The soldiers heard they were not to go to Camp Mabry because Texas troops had threatened to use ball cartridges against them in maneuvers. They knew Colonel Hoyt made a request that the Twenty-fifth be not sent to Texas.

Second. The people did not desire the colored troops and thought they should not be sent here. I learned this before the rumored abandonment of Brown from prominent citizens, members of the committee of safety, etc. I think requests were sent to Senators, Congressmen, etc., to use their influence in the matter, but am not positive. If a fact it is probably known at the War Department.

Third. Soldiers of the Twenty-fifth were not allowed to drink with white people at the principal bars in town, though in some cases saloon keepers put up a separate bar for their use, this having an opposite effect to that intended. The bartender was killed in such a saloon.

Fourth. Tate-Newton, Baker-Reed cases, etc., (see B and B"'). Tate-Newton case was that of a party of ladies standing on street sidewalk; claimed that two colored soldiers rudely jostled them. Mr. Tate, inspector of customs, husband of one of the ladies, knocked down one of the soldiers with his revolver. The ladies were obstructing the sidewalk, although anybody could have easily gotten by them. The soldier was rude and probably insulting in his manner. Tate's remedy was too drastic. It was "in the manner of the South." He told me he would have used it against any man—white or black. Mr. Vann, collector of customs, invited Major Penrose to assist at an investigation of this case, but latter had no time after the 13th. Reed and another colored soldier were at ferry landing, having returned from Matamoros. Mr. Baker, inspector of customs, claimed they were drunk and disorderly (confirmed by an unprejudiced witness); that he told them to move on, and finally pushed one who fell off plank walk into mud and water about knee deep, more through his condition than strength of the push. Baker probably used more than he acknowledged. Facts in these two cases were exaggerated on both sides and increased the bitter feeling between soldiers and citizens. I heard of several cases of threats from both sides before the 13th, but believe them manufactured.

Fifth. Case of Mrs. Evans (see B). There is no doubt she was seized by the hair and thrown violently to the ground by a tall negro soldier, who then ran away through fear of people close by. This incident, occurring on the 12th, inflamed and infuriated the people very much. The canceling of passes, sending out patrols, etc., probably increased the resentment of the soldiers against the people of Brownsville.

THE RAID INTO TOWN.

From the evidence obtainable I believe the first shots were fired between B Company barracks and the wall separating post from town. A number were fired into the air for the purpose of creating an alarm. The soldiers, 9 to 15, possibly more, then jumped the wall and started through town. There is no reliable evidence to support the claim that the first shots came from town, and no bullet marks were found on barracks. From their direction, etc., I am sure three shots through Mr. Yturria's house came from a point near the center of B Company's upper back porch.

This I will have occasion to refer to hereafter. It may be well to a proper understanding of this to remark as we proceed that on the morning of the 14th of August, immediately following the shooting, Major Penrose made an inspection of all the barracks of the battalion, and there was not the scratch or the mark of a bullet upon any one of them, nor was there a shot fired in such a manner as to endanger the life or the limb of a soldier. This simply is important when we come to consider whether this was an attack by the citizens upon the soldiers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WARNER. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri, who is very familiar with the testimony and all the hearings in connection with this matter, whether any officer or enlisted man in any of the companies concerned in the Brownsville affair have ever been tried before any court, civil or military?

Mr. WARNER. Did I understand the Senator to say officers or privates?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Officers or men.

Mr. WARNER. Major Penrose was court-martialed; Captain Macklin was court-martialed, and a certain number of the men were arrested at Brownsville, but on investigation had by the grand jury they were discharged, as I think I shall show, because it was impossible to identify the individual men.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield further to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I notice in the printed report a letter from The Military Secretary, under date of September 3, addressed to William Loeb, jr., secretary to the President, in which it is stated a number of times that it is the intention of the President to try these men by military court. Has that eminently fair and laudable plan been abandoned? Are we to treat this case, so far as any court-martial or trial of any character is concerned, as a closed incident? Is that the purpose of the Senator's argument, and is that the purpose of the bill he has offered, or are these men to be given their day in court, where they can face their accusers?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. With the permission of the Senator from Missouri, I will ask if the Senator from Michigan refers to privates or officers?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I refer to both privates and officers.

Mr. BORAH. Two of the officers have been tried by court-martial.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And acquitted?

Mr. BORAH. And acquitted.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What officers?

Mr. BORAH. Major Penrose and Captain Macklin; but in the Penrose court-martial——

Mr. WARNER. I will come to that in a few moments.

Mr. BORAH. In the Penrose court-martial issue was tendered as to the participation of the soldiers.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I must be allowed to say in answer to that suggestion that the men were not before the Penrose court-martial at all, and were not represented before the Penrose court-martial. In my opinion, if that is to be brought in here, there will be more plain talking on that subject than on any other that has been introduced in connection with this matter.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WARNER. I dislike to have this controversy interjected, but I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I shall take occasion during the remarks I shall make to refer to the findings of the court-martial in the Penrose case.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; I have no doubt the Senator will; but when the Senator does it he will state what the record shows and he will not mislead anybody as to what is in the record.

Mr. WARNER. Not if I know it.

Mr. FORAKER. I know the Senator will not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WARNER. What is the Senator's question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether as a matter of fact the civil proceedings which were initiated by Judge Welch were ever completed; whether the proceedings of the grand jury were simply dropped or superseded by some other action, or whether, as a matter of fact, they were carried to completion?

Mr. WARNER. I will say, if the Senator from Michigan will pardon me—I really desire interruptions, ordinarily, being used to them in the practice of the law, but I have marked out a certain course here, and I should like to pursue it. I will, however, answer the question. As I understand, the Senator's question is whether those proceedings have been concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. WARNER. In the criminal court?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; and whether the grand jury made its report.

Mr. WARNER. If the Senator has before him Document No. 155, he will find that the grand jury did make its report, and, as I have said, Mr. President, sufficient evidence was not found to identify any individual soldier so as to secure an indictment; but, as the county attorney, Mr. Kleiber, testified before the committee, the grand jury did believe the shooting had been done by the colored battalion, but could not identify the men.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not wish to annoy the Senator. I am asking purely for information——

Mr. WARNER. The Senator can not annoy me; he is too kind.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But the Senator has quoted several times from Major Blocksom, and I find on page 93 of the record that Major Blocksom reported to the Military Secretary at Washington that—

> The accused men can not get a fair trial in this county on account of prejudice.

Now, I want to know from the Senator from Missouri whether, notwithstanding that statement and report, the grand jury did set aside all these charges because they could not be fixed upon anyone?

Mr. WARNER. I thought I had answered that, but whether the prejudice existed there, as Major Blocksom states, or not, those living there could tell better than I, and the Senator from Michigan has, with me, the same opportunities of knowledge. The grand jury did fail to return an indictment because it could not identify the individual soldiers, but, as the county attorney said, the grand jury did believe that the men of the command had done the shooting. And to the preceding question of the Senator I will say that the case, as far as any court-martial is concerned, is a closed incident, and that the President, in discharging these soldiers "without honor," acted clearly within his constitutional powers as Commander in Chief of the Army and in conformity with the Articles of War, and his action in this respect is not questioned by the Senate resolution authorizing this investigation.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. I will not interrupt the Senator at all if he has the slightest objection, but I should like to suggest to the Senator here that it should go in the RECORD in that connection that the men against whom the grand jury found nothing—put it on the ground of lack of identity, if you please—were the men who necessarily would have known something, or have had something to do with it, if the soldiers had done the firing, because they were the noncommissioned officers, including the sergeant in charge of the guns that night.

Mr. WARNER. But conceding that for the moment—which I do not, in fact, fully concede—conceding that for the moment, the mere suspicion that these officers knew about it would not be sufficient to secure an indictment against individual soldiers. The Senator from Ohio would not contend that.

I continue the reading of Major Blocksom's report:

> A Mexican boy sleeping on the floor of the Yturria porch said they were among the first fired.
>
> Mr. Rendall lives over telegraph office opposite post gate. A bullet went through his sitting room; it came from a point near the wall opposite southwestern end of C Company barracks. Some of the first shots fired also came from the vicinity of D Company barracks. The line of barracks of B, D, and C companies runs northeast to southwest. The wall between post and town is parallel to and about 75 feet northwest of line of barracks. An alley through town, perpendicular to wall, beginning at a point nearly opposite space between B and D Company barracks, was the line of operation (about three blocks in length).
>
> The raiders first struck Cowan's house (at end of first block). There were two women and five children in it. It is a miracle some of them were not shot. The raiders could not help knowing they had not yet gone to bed. About ten shots were fired, nearly all going through house at a height of 4½ feet or less above floor. One shot put out the lamp setting on a table. Mrs. Cowan has been on the verge of hysterics ever since. It is said the Cowan children had made fun of the "nigger soldiers;" but I could not pin down the reports. There must be some truth in them. The lieutenant of police, Dominguez, heard the firing and rode through it, accompanied by two policemen. Near corner of Miller Hotel (end of second block) the two policemen turned back, but Dominguez kept on, and the raiders started firing upon him. He said there were about 15 colored soldiers in the party. He was mounted on a white horse, and went half a block after reaching corner of hotel, when his horse fell dead, shot through the body several times. The raiders were probably at the corner and continued firing on the fleeing man until horse fell. Dominguez was shot in right arm (afterwards amputated below elbow). He did not even draw his revolver from holster. A number of shots were also fired at the other two policemen. Dominguez, many years on the police force, is universally respected. The raiders fired seven or eight times into the Miller Hotel, including several shots at a guest sitting by a window. After shooting Dominguez they divided. One party proceeded along the alley. Frank Natus, bartender in Tillman's saloon (about two-thirds the way down third block) heard them coming and started to close the back door, but was shot and probably instantly killed about 20 feet from door. A Mexican in the saloon, Precindo by name, was slightly wounded in the hand by a bullet which passed through his coat. Natus had never had any trouble with the soldiers, as far as known. Five or six shots were fired through the back door. This party tried to get into the back door of another saloon, but it was closed.
> The other party went half a block to the right, then turned to the left and fired five or six shots into Mr. Starck's house (second from corner on street parallel to alley), evidently mistaking it for Tate's (which is third). Bullet marks in Starck's house are higher than in Cowan's. Mrs. Starck said two shots went through mosquito bar over bed in which she and two children were sleeping. These were the last attacks, and raiders then probably ran back. Bullet marks were found on several other houses in vicinity of those already mentioned.
> None of the individual raiders was recognized. Streets are poorly lighted, and it was a dark night. Those who saw them were busy trying to keep out of sight themselves. The soldiers were comparative strangers in town, having arrived only two weeks before. That the raiders were soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry can not be doubted. The evidence of many witnesses of all classes is conclusive. Shattered bullets, shells, and clips found are merely corroborative.
> RESPONSIBILITY BEFORE AND DURING THE FACT.
> I do not think the commanding and other officers and some of the senior noncommissioned officers can be blamed for not discovering the preconcerted raid. It is easy to say, in the light of later events, that the guard should have been doubled and other precautions taken the night of the 13th, but who could imagine that American soldiers in a body would try to murder unoffending women and innocent children?
>
> The commanding officer did cancel passes and send out patrols early in the evening, as much to allay the anger of townpeople as to prevent men from committing other excesses. It may be interesting to note here that troops were paid on the 11th.
>
> All the officers firmly believed (most of them till morning) the garrison was attacked from the town side as a result of the assault on Mrs. Evans, the general ill feeling of townpeople, etc., and this delusion was heightened by the call to arms sounded by order of the sergeant of the guard (probably too early during the firing to be genuine). As a consequence the raiders were not suspected by their officers and had an easy time getting back; while arm racks were opened with difficulty in the dark, preparations made for defense, etc., cleaning the rifle requires a few minutes only.
> Major Penrose is indefinite in his statement as to time command was paraded. It was at least ten minutes after the first shots were fired; probably longer. Captain Macklin, officer of the day, says he went to bed between twenty and ten minutes to midnight, very much fatigued, and slept through all the uproar until about 1 a. m. The first shots were fired a few minutes before midnight. It is singular the members of the guard sent to wake him up could not find him, although, as far as he is concerned, I found no reason to doubt his statement.
> RESPONSIBILITY AFTER THE FACT.
> I think Major Penrose, as soon as he believed the criminals were soldiers, should have arrested and placed in solitary confinement Sergeant Jackson, B Company (senior sergeant present in company, as well as in charge of quarters), Sergeant Reid, B Company (sergeant of the guard), Private Howard, D Company (sentinel around barracks), and Scavenger Tamayo (at B Company water-closet, next the wall where firing began). It is very probable that proper effort would have induced one or more of these men to tell what he knew. The soldiers are among those arrested, but not the scavenger, although I recommended him to the district attorney.
>
> Major Penrose has conducted himself in a manly way under trying circumstances, although subjected to much undeserved abuse. Almost the only criticism against him is that above. The officers appeared to be trying to find the criminals, but it is certainly unfortunate for the reputation of the battalion that they have as yet hardly discovered a single clue to such a terrible preconcerted crime committed by so many men. I believe the battalion had an excellent reputation up to the 13th of August, but the stain now upon it is the worst I have ever seen in the Army. Many of its old soldiers, who had nothing to do with the raid, must know something tangible as to the identity of the criminals. If they do not disclose their knowledge they should be made to suffer with others more guilty, as far as the law will permit.
> RECOMMENDATION.
> If satisfactory evidence concerning the identity of the criminals does not come from members of the battalion before a certain date, to be fixed by the War Department, I recommend "that all enlisted men of the three companies present on the night of August 13th be discharged the service and debarred from enlisting in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps."

It will be recalled, Mr. President, that Major Penrose, in his report of August 15, to the Military Secretary, said:

> I am conducting the most rigid examination possible, examining every man and working in conjunction with the citizens' committee, and I believe the offenders will be apprehended, although it will take time. The best of the men are very much perturbed over the matter, and I believe through them rather than my own efforts the perpetrators of this wanton crime will be apprehended.

Yet that officer, with his ripe experience, after conducting the "most rigid examination possible" for five weeks, and having the benefit of the counsel of such experienced officers as Colonel Lovering and Major Blocksom, under date of September 20, 1906, thirty-five days after the Brownsville raid, reported to the military secretary of the Department of Texas as follows:

FORT RENO, OKLA., September 20, 1906.

THE MILITARY SECRETARY, DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS,
San Antonio, Tex.

SIR: In obedience to the department commander's instructions contained in your telegrams of August 26 and 28, the enlisted men of Companies B, C, and D, Twenty-fifth Infantry, have been held at this post without privileges of any kind, and prior to arrival here, from August 14 to 27, were confined strictly to the limits of Fort Brown, Tex. Therefore they have had no liberty of any kind or character for over a month.

Since arriving at Fort Reno, in addition to allowing no privileges whatever and being confined within the limits of the post, I have given the enlisted men of these companies extra guard, extra drills, and constant police work, besides having tattoo roll call for them, and always one, sometimes two, inspections after the regular 11 o'clock p. m. inspection.

At first I was under the impression that these extra drills, police and privations would have the effect of inducing some one who was not among the criminals, but who has knowledge of the guilty parties to the shooting at Brownsville, to give me some information that would lead to the detection of some of the men, but up to this time it has proven an utter failure, and I doubt very much if it will ever accomplish the desired results. In fact I am of the opinion that it is having the contrary effect, by keeping the men constantly on their guard, and this view is shared by the officers of the battalion, as well as many of the old noncommissioned officers who are thoroughly reliable and trustworthy, and whose opinions in such matters are worthy of consideration.

In view of this fact I respectfully suggest that one of the two following plans be authorized:

First. Take off all restrictions imposed. Return to the regular routine of post duty, and lead the men to believe the whole Brownsville matter has been dropped, but have three colored detectives enlisted and one assigned to each of the three companies.

Second. That authority be granted by the Secretary of War to discharge, if necessary, all but 20 per cent of the enlisted men of the three companies, the discharges to be so notated that enlistment again would be impossible.

To carry out this latter suggestion I would have it published to the men that on a certain specified date, a month later, for instance, if the criminals were not detected and reported, 20 per cent of each company would be discharged. At the end of a second period of thirty days, if the men still remained undetected, a second lot of 20 per cent of the original numbers of the companies would be discharged, and so on, in periods of thirty days, until but 20 per cent of the men are left. The men discharged, in all cases, to be selected by the company commanders. This latter is a drastic measure and should, in my opinion, be resorted to only after the first suggestion had been given a fair trial and had proven a failure.

Mr. CLAPP. I was called out of the Chamber for a moment. Is the Senator now reading the recommendation of Major Penrose?

Mr. WARNER. Yes; his report of September 20, showing what was before the President.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to state, for the information of the Senator from Minnesota, that later Major Penrose and all the other officers changed their minds as to the guilt of these men, and so testified.

Mr. WARNER. The Senator from Ohio, I trust, will do me the justice to say that I shall refer to that at the proper time.

Mr. FORAKER. It may be that the Senator will, but it is a privilege we generally take here to prevent our colleagues from making an improper impression.

Mr. WARNER. I am glad to be thus prevented, although, of course, I had no such purpose.

Mr. FORAKER. I am sure the Senator had not, but I made the statement only because of the fact of the lack of information which possibly the Senator from Minnesota had on the subject.

Mr. WARNER. I continue the reading:

I am strongly of the opinion that but few men have any knowledge of the deplorable Brownsville affair, but it is quite evident those few will never betray their comrades under present conditions. The majority of the men, particularly the old soldiers who have served their country for years gallantly and faithfully and borne themselves honorably, feel this matter very deeply, and, I believe, are doing all they can to detect the guilty; but it must be remembered the negro race is a very secretive one, and those having knowledge of the shooting, without being participants, will hesitate a long time under most adverse conditions before giving information.

I recommend that the first plan be given a fair trial, for once the present restraint is removed and the men given the usual liberty they will be more apt to talk, and especially after drinking a little, but to be reasonably hopeful of success detectives must be employed.

Very respectfully,

C. W. PENROSE,
Major, Twenty-fifth Infantry, Commanding.

Mr. President, five weeks of patient investigation strengthened Major Penrose's belief that men of his command made the assault on Brownsville. For the discovery of the guilty parties he recommended two plans, the first being questionable and the second drastic.

There was an investigation of the shooting by the grand jury of Cameron County, of which Brownsville is the county seat. This investigation was had the week following the shooting. Mr. John L. Kleiber, the district attorney for that county, who conducted the examination of witnesses before the grand jury, when before the committee, in answer to the question by Senator Foraker:

Now, in the investigation before the grand jury you proceeded upon the assumption that some of the negro soldiers had done the shooting, didn't you?

said:

No, sir; I did not proceed upon any assumption.

And in answer to the further question,

Was not that the general opinion in Brownsville?

He said:

I had no opinion about it except such as I have formed from evidence.

He then added—

I want to say to the committee that my course throughout this whole matter has been that of an official trying to do his duty, not only for the people who we felt had been injured, but to the parties accused of having committed that injury, and although we were satisfied from the evidence, and the grand jury reported to the court that this shooting had been done by men of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, yet that the evidence did not point with sufficient certainty to any individual or individuals to justify or warrant them in bringing in an indictment and presenting these parties.

The conclusion reached by the grand jury that the shooting was done by soldiers was the same as that reached by the citizens' committee and by Majors Penrose and Blocksom.

By every investigation up to this time there was but one conclusion ever reached as to who the parties were; that is the parties, not the individuals.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. BULKELEY. I should like to ask the Senator if there is any record of the finding of the grand jury, except that they failed to return an indictment?

Mr. WARNER. None that I know of. I have not claimed that there was.

Mr. BULKELEY. As I understood the Senator, he made the claim that the grand jury found the same as the citizens' committee; and if I understand the evidence before the Senate committee, there was no finding whatever by the grand jury, except that they failed to return an indictment and were then discharged by order of the court.

Mr. WARNER. I have read, if the Senator will permit me, the testimony of the State's attorney, who said that they so reported to the court that the shooting had been done by members of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, and then I said that this finding that the shooting was done by members of the Twenty-fifth Infantry was in accordance with the findings of the citizens' committee and of Majors Penrose and Blocksom.

Mr. BULKELEY. I do not understand, from any of the records, that there was any finding whatever presented to the court except the failure to return an indictment.

Mr. WARNER. If the Senator will pardon me, I have not claimed or intimated, nor does the State's attorney claim, that a written report was made to that effect, but he says that they reported to that effect.

Mr. BULKELEY. But there is no record of any such finding by the jury.

Mr. WARNER. We shall have no controversy about that, I apprehend.

Although, Mr. President, all the reports coming to the President from civilians and Army officers concurred in the finding that the assault on Brownsville was made by unidentified soldiers of the colored battalion, yet he was loath to issue the order discharging, "without honor," all, or part, of the battalion present at Fort Brown on the night of the shooting, in the hope, no doubt, that further investigation would develop facts that would enable him, with reasonable certainty, to separate the innocent from the guilty. This delay, it was claimed in certain quarters, showed, on his part, not only a want of regard for the discipline of the Army, but also for the protection of the lives of the citizens, some even going so far as to charge that the delay was because of favoritism to the negro troops.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand this affray occurred on the 13th of August?

Mr. WARNER. On the night of the 13-14th of August.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What was the date of the final order issued by the President?

Mr. WARNER. The 5th of November.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How many reports had the President received from Army officers, civilians, and others concerning this affair before he made his order?

Mr. WARNER. That is what I am about to state.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator is coming to that point?

Mr. WARNER. There was first the report of the citizens' committee; then the telegram and report from Major Penrose; then came the report from Major Blocksom, accompanied by affidavits and statements of citizens, and then the report of September 20, by Major Penrose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, I want to ask my final question—whether or not the final order made by the President was made by him upon the recommendation of the War Department, the War Department having first formulated the order?

Mr. WARNER. It was made upon the recommendation of Major Garlington, the Inspector-General, who went down there. I think I am correct in that. But the order discharging these men was the order of the President.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. And he never has attempted to shift the responsibility to anyone else.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course no President, as Commander in Chief of the Army, will attempt to avoid responsibility for any order issued by him. The point that these questions sought to elicit was that the order had been made in the usual course of business upon recommendation of the War Department after the President had waited a time so long that, as the Senator says, it subjected him to criticism for not maintaining discipline. In other words, as I have listened, it has appeared not to be an order originated by the President.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. No one, from the beginning of this controversy, has asserted at any time that there was any kind of a report made to the President down to the time when he issued his order except only a report in the nature of the guilt of the soldiers. He had no suggestion made to him of innocence as opposed to their guilt. That is to say, all the inspecting officers sent there and all the citizens of Brownsville were of one mind about it. But the trouble was that all that was ex parte.

Mr. WARNER. If the Senator from Ohio will pardon me, I have stated all that.

Mr. FORAKER. I know the Senator has.

Mr. WARNER. I am willing to yield to any interruption, but it seems to me where it is only a repetition of what I have said, interruptions are unnecessary, because the Senator from Ohio and I will not or ought not to disagree as to the facts in this case.

Mr. FORAKER. Although the Senator had stated it and stated it clearly, and I fully understood it, nevertheless the Senator from Indiana asked a question, and I was trying to help out the Senator from Missouri in the matter.

Mr. WARNER. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

In a final effort to get, if possible, additional facts, the President, on the 4th day of October, 1906, ordered Brigadier-General Garlington, Inspector-General of the United States Army, an officer of long service, to proceed to Fort Reno, Okla., where the Brownsville battalion was then stationed, and make further investigation of the Brownsville affray, with instructions to notify the soldiers of Companies B and C and D that if the identity of the guilty parties was not revealed, an order of dismissal, without honor, would be issued. General Garlington, after many days of careful investigation at Fort Reno, Okla., where the Brownsville battalion was then stationed, being in constant consultation with the officers, found, "beyond reasonable doubt," to use his language, that the firing into the homes of citizens of Brownsville * * * was done by enlisted men of the colored battalion.

I read from General Garlington's report:

I recommend that orders be issued as soon as practicable, discharging, without honor, every man in Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, serving at Fort Brown, Tex., on the night of August 13, 1906, and forever debarring them from reenlistment in the Army or Navy of the United States, as well as from employment in any civil capacity under the Government. In making this recommendation I recognize the fact that a number of men who have no direct knowledge as to the identity of the men of the Twenty-fifth Infantry who actually fired the shots on the night of the 13th of August, 1906, will incur this extreme penalty.

It has been established, by careful investigation, beyond reasonable doubt, that the firing into the houses of the citizens of Brownsville, while the inhabitants thereof were pursuing their peaceful vocation or sleeping, and by which one citizen was killed and the chief of police so seriously wounded that he lost an arm, was done by enlisted men of the Twenty-fifth Infantry belonging to the battalion stationed at Fort Brown. After due opportunity and notice, the enlisted men of the Twenty-fifth Infantry have failed to tell all that it is reasonable to believe they know concerning the shooting. If they had done so, if they had been willing to relate all the circumstances—instances preliminary to the trouble—it is extremely probable that a clew sufficiently definite to lead to results would have been disclosed. They appear to stand together in a determination to resist the detection of the guilty; therefore they should stand together when the penalty falls. A forceful lesson should be given to the Army at large, and especially to the noncommissioned officers, that their duty does not cease upon the drill ground, with the calling of the company rolls, making check inspections, and other duty of formal character, but that their responsibilities of office accompany them everywhere and at all times; that it is their duty to become thoroughly acquainted with the individual members of their respective units; to know their characteristics; to be able at all times to gauge their temper, in order to discover the beginning of discontent or of mutinous intentions, and to anticipate any organized act of disorder; that they must notify their officers at once of any such conditions. Moreover, the people of the United States, wherever they live, must feel assured that the men wearing the uniform of the Army are their protectors, and not midnight assassins or riotous disturbers of the peace of the community in which they may be stationed.

No absolutely accurate verification of the rifles and men of the battalion was made on the night of the 13th of August in time to account for all the rifles or all the men at the beginning of the firing or immediately upon its conclusion. This failure is explained as follows: The commanding officer and his associates, when the alarm was sounded and they heard the firing, assumed that it came from the city of Brownsville, and that the guns were in the hands of civilians; in other words, that the garrison was being fired into from the outside by civilians. It does not appear to have occurred to any of them that certain enlisted men of the Twenty-fifth Infantry had possession of their arms, and were committing the crime of firing into the houses and upon the citizens of Brownsville until the mayor of the city came into the garrison and informed the commanding officer, Major Penrose, that one man had been killed and another wounded by his soldiers.

The finding by General Garlington that soldiers of the colored battalion were guilty of the murderous assault on the sleeping and helpless men, women, and children was but confirmatory of every report that had come to the President, whether from citizens or Army officers. To have retained these soldiers in the service with the stain of that crime resting upon them would have been criminal. No community in which they might be stationed would feel secure. Instead of being regarded as protectors they would be feared as a menace. The President realizing that "there can be nothing more important than for the United States Army, in all its membership, to understand that its arms can not be turned with impunity against the peace and order of the civil community," and acting clearly within his constitutional power as Commander in Chief, on the 5th day of November, 1906, directed the issuance of the order discharging "without honor" the enlisted men of the battalion of the Twenty-fifth Infantry who were present at Fort Brown on the night of the shooting. Sir, while it is to be regretted that some of the battalion, who, in all probability, were guiltless, either as principals or accessories before or after the fact, came within the order, yet, regrettable as that fact is, better this than that a band of lawless raiders should continue to wear the uniform of United States soldiers.

Mr. President, since the President's order there have been three separate investigations of the Brownsville affray—one ex parte, it is true, by Major Blocksom, of the United States Army, and Mr. Purdy, of the Department of Justice; another by the Penrose court-martial, and the next by the Senate committee. The evidence taken at each of these investigations has strengthened the reports submitted to the President and upon which he based his order of dismissal. An impartial review of the testimony of these investigations leads irresistibly to the conclusion that some of the members of the colored battalion participated in the "shooting up" of the town of Brownsville and that others were guilty as accessories before or after the fact.

The court-martial that tried Major Penrose on the charge of "neglect of duty, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, in violation of the sixty-second article of war," while it acquitted that officer it found that certain men of his command shot, wounded, and killed citizens of Brownsville. The charge and the specifications under which Major Penrose was tried were as follows:

Charge.—Neglect of duty, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, in violation of the sixty-second article of war.

Specification I.—In that Maj. Charles W. Penrose, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, commanding the post at Fort Brown, Tex., after being on the morning of August 14, 1906, between 1 and 2 a. m., duly informed by the mayor of Brownsville, Tex., one Doctor Combe, that soldiers of his command had shot and killed one civilian of the city of Brownsville, Tex., and badly wounded a lieutenant of police of that city, did immediately thereafter and until daylight wholly fail and neglect to take or order sufficient measure or action by prompt inspection of guns or pistols or otherwise, or any due exercise of discipline, to detect the men engaged in said attack and killing, or any of them, or to restrain or bring them to justice for said crime. This at Fort Brown August 14, 1906.

Specification II.—In that Maj. Charles W. Penrose, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, being aware of the feeling of resentment in his command toward citizens of Brownsville, Tex., as a result of assaults upon certain individuals of the command, and having been notified by a Mr. Evans, of Brownsville, about 5 p. m., August 13, 1906, of an attack upon his wife by a soldier of the command, and knowing of the inflamed feeling existing in the town toward the soldiers as a result thereof, did nevertheless fail to give any orders to Capt. E. A. Macklin,

Twenty-fifth Infantry, officer of the day, requiring special vigilance on his part or that of the guard; or to make frequent inspections, or any inspections during the night after 12 o'clock; and did wholly fail and neglect to take or order sufficient measures or precautions to hold at the post the men of his command, or in any manner to watch, restrain, or discipline said men; by reason of which failure certain men of his command, to the number of about 12 or more, were enabled to assemble, and did assemble, armed with rifles, and did proceed to the town of Brownsville, Tex., and did then and there shoot and wound and kill certain citizens thereof. This at Fort Brown and Brownsville, Tex., August 13 and 14, 1906.

Right here I may state that the Evans case is the charge that some soldier, unidentified, had seized the woman and dragged her from her horse as she was returning to her home. I simply throw this in here to show what was referred to.

Upon this specification Major Penrose was tried.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. WARNER. I hope the Senator from Ohio will pardon me. I prefer to finish.

Mr. FORAKER. I only wanted to ask the Senator whether he was reading the specification as originally framed.

Mr. WARNER. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I will get to it. I am reading the specification as originally framed. The Senator will see I am coming to it.

On the first specification the finding of the court was "Not guilty."

On the second specifications the finding was "guilty," except the words "being aware of the feeling of resentment in his command toward the citizens of Brownsville, as a result of assaults upon certain individuals of the command, and;" and the word "inflamed," and the words "special vigilance on his part or that of the guard, or to make;" and the words "and did wholly fail and neglect to take or order sufficient measures or precautions to hold at the post the men of his command, or in any manner to watch, restrain, or discipline said men, by reason of which failure;" and substituting for the words "by reason of which failure" the words "after which," and also except the words "to the number of twelve or more were enabled to assemble and;" and of these excepted words he was found "Not guilty."

The amended specification upon which Major Penrose was found guilty is worthy of the attention of every Senator. It reads——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DU PONT in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator says "upon which Major Penrose was found guilty." Was Major Penrose found guilty?

Mr. WARNER. On the second specification.

Mr. FORAKER. Charged with what?

Mr. WARNER. But no criminality attached thereto.

Specification II, as amended, is as follows:

In that Maj. Charles W. Penrose—

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator from Missouri would state what specification this officer was tried upon—whether upon the one he has just read or upon the one he is going to read.

Mr. WARNER. The one I have just read he was tried upon, but the court-martial found certain words in that specification that he was not guilty of and framed the specification which I shall now read, and found him guilty.

Mr. TELLER. Did it try him again?

Mr. WARNER. Not again; but it seems under the practice they could find him not guilty as to certain parts——

Mr. BULKELEY. As I understand, then, the Senator now states that Major Penrose was not found guilty under the specification which he has read.

Mr. WARNER. I have tried to make myself plain, that he was not found guilty as to certain parts of it, and under the other specification he was found guilty.

Mr. TELLER. A new specification was prepared?

Mr. WARNER. It is new only in this, that upon certain words in the first specification he was found not guilty. If the Senator will permit me to read the specification——

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have it made clear.

Mr. WARNER. I will read it. The amended specification of which Major Penrose was found guilty reads as follows:

Specification II.—In that Maj. Charles W. Penrose, Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, having been notified by a Mr. Evans, of Brownsville, about 5 p. m., August 13, 1906, of an attack upon his wife by a soldier of the command, and knowing of the feeling existing in the town toward the soldiers as a result thereof, did, nevertheless, fail to give any orders to Capt. E. A. Macklin, Twenty-fifth Infantry, officer of the day, requiring frequent inspections, or any inspections, during the night after 12 o'clock, after which certain men of his command did assemble, armed with rifles, and did proceed to the town of Brownsville, Tex., and did then and there shoot and wound and kill certain citizens thereof. This at Fort Brown and Brownsville, Tex., August 13 and 14, 1906. And the court attaches no criminality thereto on his part.

It will be observed that the court found that Major Penrose, knowing of the feelihg existing on the part of his soldiers toward the citizens of Brownsville, "did fail to give any orders" to the officer of the day requiring frequent inspections or any inspections, and the court further found that—during the night, "after 12 o'clock," certain men of his command did assemble, armed with rifles, and did proceed to the town of Brownsville, and did then and there shoot, wound, and kill certain citizens thereof.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not understand the language to which the Senator has just now called attention to be a finding of guilty. If the Senator will read the next line he will see that is a part of the specification, and they find him not guilty of the charge.

Mr. WARNER. He was found guilty on this specification.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not see that there is any finding of that kind before me in the record. The finding of the court-martial follows immediately, and is that he is not guilty of the charge. That is the specification upon which he was put to trial as the court-martial amended it after they had heard the testimony.

Mr. WARNER. If the Senator has the record there I will show him.

Mr. FORAKER. I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. WARNER. The record will show beyond peradventure that I am correct in this statement.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, I do not——

Mr. WARNER. The general court-martial making these findings was composed of one colonel, six lieutenant-colonels, and six majors. The trial continued through a period of four months, the testimony submitted to the court covering over 1,200 pages. It will hardly be claimed that the officers of that court were prejudiced against the soldiers. An examination of the court-martial proceedings will show that the main effort upon the part of the learned counsel, who so ably represented Major Penrose, was directed to the issue that the men of the command of the accused did not participate in the shooting. Substantially all the evidence that was introduced before the Committee on Military Affairs was introduced before the court-martial.

It does not weaken the finding of the court, that unidentified members of the colored battalion were guilty of the midnight attack on Brownsville, to say that it was Major Penrose and not the colored soldiers who was on trial. For, if it could be shown that the shooting was not done by men of his command, then there could be no case against Major Penrose. The importance of this line of defense was never for a moment lost sight of by counsel for Major Penrose, for on his part evidence was introduced to show that all the soldiers of the battalion were in the barracks at the time of the shooting; that immediately following the shooting a roll call showed that all the members of Companies B, C, and D were present or accounted for; that an inspection showed that each soldier had the required amount of ammunition; that the guns showed no signs of having been fired; that the result of experiments showed that on a moonless, starlit night such as that of August 13–14 it was impossible to distinguish a colored man from a white man at a distance of a few feet. Nor was the materiality of this and other evidence tending to show who did the shooting, and therefore bearing upon the question of the guilt or innocence of those soldiers, ever doubted by counsel participating in the court-martial proceedings. In other words, it was necessary as a matter of law for the court-martial, before rendering a verdict of guilty against Major Penrose, to find: First, that the shooting up of Brownsville was done by soldiers of his command; second, that Major Penrose did not take such precautions to prevent the raid as his duty as commanding officer required him to take. The court found against him on the first proposition, and in his favor on the second, and hence acquitted him.

I submit, Mr. President, that the members of the court, by means of their training, were peculiarly qualified to determine the weight to be given to the evidence as to the accuracy of the roll call of the companies soon after the shooting, the distance those engaged in the shooting would have to go in order to join their company undetected, the opportunity for enlisted men to obtain surplus ammunition, the habits of soldiers to have extra cartridges in their possession, the weight to be given to the inspection of the guns and ammunition a few hours after the shooting, and other facts urged to show that the assault was not made by soldiers of the colored battalion. These experienced officers were uninfluenced by prejudice, passion, or political considerations. That Colonel Glenn, the chief counsel for Major Penrose, in his determined effort to convince the court, by evidence and argument, that the negro soldiers did not participate in the shooting, showed great industry in the preparation of the evidence, and marked ability in its presentation, no one who reads the proceedings of the court-martial will doubt.

Mr. President, one hundred and seventy witnesses appeared before the committee; of these, eighty-four were the noncommissioned officers and privates of Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth Infantry. In the taking of the testimony little regard was paid to the rules of evidence; hearsay evidence in the first, second, and third degree was admitted, the aim of the committee being to open every avenue to get at the facts. That its investigation was patient and searching, no one who will read the thousands of pages of evidence will question, yet at the conclusion of the committee's investigation the main facts of the affray were left practically where the documentary evidence which I have submitted to the Senate left them. A discussion in detail of the evidence of each witness would be too great a tax on the patience of the Senate. A few preliminary statements as to the feeling, whether friendly or unfriendly, between negro soldiers and citizens of Brownsville prior to the night of the shooting may aid in an understanding of the occurrence on the night of the affray.

Brownsville is a border Mexican town, having from six to eight thousand inhabitants, two-thirds of whom are classed as Mexicans; that is, either Mexican or Mexican descent, and the remaining one-third Americans. It is fairly deducible from the evidence that a considerable number of the Americans—newcomers as they are styled by some of the witnesses—were opposed, and I am justified in saying, bitterly opposed, to the stationing of negro troops at Fort Brown, while others—that is, the old settlers—headed by the mayor, an ex-army surgeon, and Capt. William Kelly, ex-Union veteran of the civil war, had no objection to the coming of the colored battalion. The Mexicans, as a class, had no race prejudice; they, or at least a large portion of them, in the language of the witnesses, "affiliated with the negro troops, making no distinction between them and their own race." In fact, it does not appear from the evidence that, during the stay of the colored battalion at Brownsville, there was the least trouble between any of its members and the Mexicans.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I observe that my colleague on the committee has quite an amount of material before him, and he has very kindly consented to numerous interruptions. If I mistake not, he shows some fatigue. I wish to suggest to him that if he should desire to lay aside this matter and take it up to-morrow he would have that privilege.

Mr. WARNER. I was advised at the commencement that the Committee on Naval Affairs would like to proceed with the naval appropriation bill to-day. I wish to adjust myself to the business of the Senate. I am not in the habit of interfering with it. I can resume to-morrow after the morning business.

Mr. HALE. Then I will ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand that the Senator from Missouri suspends for to-day and he will resume to-morrow. Was that the announcement?

Mr. WARREN. He so gave notice.

Mr. WARNER. Pardon me; I did not hear the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I was only asking what is the understanding. I understood the Senator from Missouri to say that he would suspend at this time and resume to-morrow.

Mr. WARNER. Yes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 3, lines 3, 4, 5, and 6, under the subhead "Pay of the Navy," to increase the appropriation from $27,274,201 to $30,844,620.40.

Mr. HALE. On page 3, at the end of line 5, I move to strike out "forty" before "four" and insert "thirty," and in line 6, before the word "hundred," to strike out "six" and insert "one," so as to read "$30,834,120.40."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 6, to insert:

The pay of all commissioned officers, warrant officers, midshipmen, and pay clerks in the Navy, civilian professors and civilian instructors at the Naval Academy, is hereby increased 20 per cent. And the pay of all noncommissioned officers, mates, and other petty officers, musicians, and other enlisted persons in the Navy is hereby increased 10 per cent: Provided, That the word "pay" as used in this paragraph shall be exclusive of all additions in the form of allowances or commutations: Provided further, That hereafter the pay and allowances of professors of mathematics, naval constructors, and civil engineers and assistant civil engineers in the Navy shall be the same as are or may be provided by or in pursuance of law for officers of the same rank in the Medical and Pay Corps of the Navy, but nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to reduce the pay or allowances now authorized by law for any officer of the Navy. And the rate of pay herein established shall continue to be in force until changed by new enactment of law.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to move an amendment to that paragraph.

Mr. HALE. There are one or two committee amendments to the amendment that I desire to put in first.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

Mr. HALE. On page 3, line 7, after the word "all," I move to insert "active and retired," so as to read:

The pay of all active and retired commissioned officers—

And so forth.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 3, line 10, after the word "all," I move to insert "active and retired," so as to read:

And the pay of all active and retired noncommissioned officers—

And so forth.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 3, line 15, after the word "commutations," I move to insert:

and section 1267, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to officers of the Navy.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 22, after the word "officer," I move to insert "or enlisted man," so as to read:

So as to reduce the pay or allowances now authorized by law for any officer or enlisted man of the Navy.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator perfected his amendments?

Mr. HALE. I have perfected this clause.

Mr. WARREN. That takes in the amendment?

Mr. HALE. Yes; it takes in the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senator if he will not agree to lay it aside until we can see it in a reprint or know the way the amendment will read as perfected. Can we not pass it over for the present?

Mr. NELSON. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment as it has now been perfected by the committee.

Mr. HALE. The rule is——

Mr. NELSON. It is certainly amendable. In line 12, on page 3, I move to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty," so as to read:

Is hereby increased 20 per cent.

I move this amendment to the end that the enlisted men in the Navy may receive the same rate of increase as the commissioned officers. I think it is an unjust discrimination to increase the pay of all kinds of commissioned and warrant officers, including midshipmen 20 per cent, and to give the enlisted men only 10 per cent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, in the committee amendment, line 12, strike out the word "ten" and insert "twenty," so as to read "20 per cent."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I realize fully the spirit in which the Senator from Minnesota offers the amendment, and it does him credit, but I think he offers it on a misunderstanding.

Heretofore the pay of the enlisted men of the Army has been fixed by law and it has remained so fixed for a great many years. In fact, the last act, except this bill now in conference, was to lower the pay and since that time it has remained upon a fixed schedule.

On the other hand, the enlisted pay of the Navy has, under the law, been subject to change whenever the President saw fit to change it. Therefore the President has raised the pay in the Navy until, before the increase proposed in the Army bill and that proposed in this bill, the enlisted men and warrant officers in the Navy have been receiving on an average, with bonuses and reenlistment raises, $33 a month, while the enlisted men and noncommissioned officers of the Army corresponding with them have been receiving $17.73.

Now, as to the commissioned officers, the law heretofore has been, as to the Army, that a certain fixed rate or schedule of pay should be given to commissioned officers and, as to the Navy, that its commissioned officers should receive the same rate of pay as that given to officers of corresponding rank in the Army. Therefore the pay of the Navy's officers has not been heretofore raised, whereas that of the rank and file of the Navy has been almost doubled.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4855) appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States to the construction of works for the drainage or reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands belonging to the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the pending appropriation bill may take the place of the bill which has just been laid before the Senate as the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the pending bill be substituted for the unfinished business.

Mr. DANIEL. Let the title of the unfinished business be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the title.

The Secretary read the title of Senate bill 4855.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request is that the Naval Appropriation bill be substituted for the unfinished business. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE. As the unfinished business.

Mr. ALDRICH. As the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is as the Chair understands. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; it is so ordered.

Mr. WARREN. In view of what I have stated, I hardly think the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] would want to raise the pay of the rank and file of the Navy, as he has proposed. I may go further and say that I have had occasion to look this up very thoroughly during the winter, and, in fact, during the session preceding it, and there has been no call made on the part of the Navy itself or generally on the part of its friends to raise the pay of the rank and file of the Navy at all, because it is already nearly twice that of the Army. The amendment of the Senator would make it nearly or quite double the proposed increased pay of the Army.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HALE. I wish to say to the Senator from Minnesota that the committee has not put this provision in without considering the enlisted force in the Navy, which it desires to properly care for. As the Senator from Wyoming has said, the Navy pay from time to time in the rank and file has been increased away beyond that of the Army. The provision that is incorporated here will not only leave the rank and file of the Navy the equal of the Army under the new provision of increased pay, but will leave it from 10 to 15 per cent higher than the Army pay, which the committee believe to be proper, because the services are of a different kind. The service takes the men away from home and the pay ought to be rather more than that of the Army.

I can say to the Senator from Minnesota that the committee desires and means to care for the enlisted men of the Navy fully as much as the officers, but the percentage of 20 per cent increase which is applied to the officers if applied to the rank and file would leave them something near double that of the Army. The committee considered that this was a fair adjustment.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and, of course, I am not as familiar with the subject as the Senator from Maine. I was under the impression until that Senator and the Senator from Wyoming made their statements that the pay of the enlisted men of the Navy was like that of the Army—a fixed matter. But I understand from the statements which have been made that their pay is of an elastic character and can be modified and increased by the President; that that has been done in several instances, and that they are now getting a very large pay compared with the Army. Under that view of the case, I think it but fair to withdraw my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota withdraws his proposed amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask that this item be laid over. I wish to make a few remarks on the matter of the commissioned officers' pay as well as that of the men, and I can do it at a later time, if the Senate prefers. I should like to have the amendment passed over for the time being.

Mr. HALE. At the request of the Senator I am entirely willing that, for the present, this clause shall be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Pay, miscellaneous," on page 4, after line 1, to insert:

> The Secretary of the Navy shall send to Congress at the beginning of its next regular session a complete schedule or list showing the amount in money of all pay under the provisions of this act and for all allowances for each grade of officers in the Navy, including retired officers, and for all officers included in this act and for all enlisted men so included.

Mr. WARREN. At that point would come in the amendment which I offered earlier in the day. I will ask the Senator if he has yet had time to scrutinize that amendment?

Mr. HALE. I looked at the Senator's amendment. It goes much further and comprehends matters not included in this paragraph. I should not be willing to modify this amendment, which is very simple and only requires a statement by the Secretary, so that at the next session we may all know what each officer and man receives in pay and allowances. If the Senator desires to incorporate his amendment as an independent proposition, I think there will be opportunity of that kind before the bill is completed. I should not want to substitute the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WARREN. It might be considered that the adoption of this amendment provided sufficiently for the object sought. I may say in a few words what my object is in the amendment that I have offered.

We have here in the naval bill, bunched together, some $40,000,000—a vast sum, indeed—which goes to pay various officers and enlisted men, but which conveys no sort of information to show what any one of these officers or men is paid; what is paid to the staff and what to the line.

Now, applying this to, or rather comparing it with, the appriation bill for the Army, there is contained in this bill one great, huge "slush fund," if I may term it such, which in the Army bill, or the two Army bills—Army appropriation bill and Military Academy bill—would be divided into probably 250 items—to be exact, 248 items—and showing plainly by such subdivision how the money is expended.

You can look at the Army bill and find what the Staff, what the Commissary Department, what the Quartermaster's Department, what the Ordnance Department draw, what their officers get, how much they get in regular pay, how much they get in additional pay for longevity, how much for retired pay; but here we have, I submit, one big slush fund that covers almost everything in the Navy except construction, and we have no manner or means of knowing upon this floor the items for which we are spending that money.

Of course I understand that the committee scrutinizes it carefully, and I find no fault with the amounts that they may propose here; but when it is stated on this floor, as it has been stated by Senators, the oldest in this body, that they have voted year after year the pay for the Navy without knowing certain items concerning it—for instance, Senators who have been here twenty-five or thirty years learned for the first time at this session that the President has the privilege of making the rate of pay for the enlisted men, and we look and see that they have been so paid ever since 1814, nearly one hundred years. Then, I submit, it would seem that now, after nearly a hundred years groping around in the darkness with a slush fund, it is pretty nearly time to take the Senate and the country into our confidence and show what division is made of this money—this $40,000,000, nearly—appropriated in one lump.

The Senator's committee amendment leads in that direction, and I believe that he intends eventually to subdivide it as a great many Senators wish it to be done, so that, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] says, we may be taken into the confidence of the committee reporting the appropriation.

But it was my desire to put in language that would compel the division in the construction of a bill at another place where this naval appropriation bill originates.

I will submit to the Senator in charge of the bill that the naval appropriation bill always reaches the Senate late in the session, when he and those associated with him are busily engaged upon other great supply bills, and he has not the time, and those who work with him on his committee have not the time to subdivide and segregate this bill as it ought to be subdivided and segregated.

My amendment is intended not only to bring the information the Senator asked for from the Department, but to cause the House committee, in constructing the bill, to subdivide it as has been done for nearly a score of years in the Army bill.

We had the same kind of thing once in the Army and the bill for years ran along with the large lump sums, but at one time, twenty years or more ago, when General Bragg was at the head of the committee in the House, a demand was made and insisted upon that the Department should render an account and should take us into confidence and show us where this money went, and that it should go into the original draft of the appropriation bill so that Members of the House and the Senate should know where the money went.

I know the Senator in charge of this bill desires the same thing. I want to accomplish it, and I want to accomplish it in the next naval appropriation bill.

Mr. BACON. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

The SECRETARY. After the amendment of the committee at the top of page 4, it is proposed to insert:

> The act of appropriation for the support of the Navy shall hereafter show, under the head of "Pay of the Navy," the sums allowed for pay of officers belonging to the line, to the several departments of the staff, and to the retired list; the appropriations to show under each head the amount allowed for pay proper, for increases due to longevity and foreign service, and for pay at sea rates to officers employed on shore; together with the total number of warrant and petty officers and seamen of the several grades and designations, including as to each class the amount allowed for pay proper and for longevity or service increases; where the rate of pay in the case of a warrant or petty officer or seamen is fixed in the discretion of the President, the rate as so established, together with the authority therefor, shall be stated in each act of appropriation.

Mr. WARREN. Now, if the Senator from Georgia will allow me, I will say that the statement from the Department in the way of an estimate has been made very much in detail every year. I hold in my hand a list for this year, in fine print, giving all these particulars. But the House has taken no notice of it in constructing the bill, and we have given it no notice here in the Senate. I submit to the Senator, and I think he will join me in the desire, that we ought to make it incumbent upon the House to put these subdivisions into the bill so that we may know where the money goes.

Mr. WARREN subsequently said: I ask permission to insert in my remarks to-day about the subdivision of appropriations a memorandum which I have prepared.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection permission is granted.

The paper referred to is as follows:

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE PAY OF THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Prior to 1872 the clause of appropriation for the pay of the Army was stated very briefly and in general terms. This is shown in the act of June 6, 1872, which contains the following provision for the pay of officers and enlisted men:

"For pay of the Army, and for payment to discharged soldiers for clothing not drawn, $12,105,591.32."—Act of June 6, 1872 (17 Stat. L., 259).

In the Army appropriation act of May 4, 1880, the number of officers of the several grades of rank in the military establishment was given. The following is the clause of appropriation for pay in that year:

"For pay of the Army: One general, 1 lieutenant-general, 3 major-generals, 15 brigadier-generals, 70 colonels, 85 lieutenant-colonels, 243 majors, 312 captains, mounted, 306 captains, not mounted, 34 chaplains, 21 storekeepers, 40 adjutants, 40 regimental quartermasters, 202 first lieutenants, mounted, 360 first lieutenants, not mounted, 146 second lieutenants, mounted, 305 second lieutenants, not mounted; including the additional pay to 35 aides-de-camp, to the adjutant and quartermaster of the Engineer battalion, to 180 acting assistant commissaries of subsistence, in addition to pay in line, to officers of foot regiments while on duty which requires them to be mounted, to the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds in Washington, and to the examiner of State claims in the office of the Secretary of War; 400 retired officers; enlisted men of all grades not exceeding 25,000 men; 450 enlisted men of the Signal Corps; the allowances for travel, retained pay, and clothing not drawn, payable to enlisted men on discharge; and 1 retired ordnance sergeant, $11,548,601.55."—Act of May 4, 1880 (21 Stat. L., 110).

The appropriation continued to be made in this form until 1886. When the Army appropriation bill was undergoing preparation in the House Committee on Military Affairs in that year, the chairman, Gen. E. S. Bragg, required the Department to furnish a complete analysis of the various items of expenditure under the head of "Pay of the Army," and this analysis of expenditures has been continued in succeeding acts of appropriation. In the pay clauses of the act of appropriation for the support of the Army of June 30, 1886 (24 Stat. L., 93), the several items of pay are arranged under the following heads:

Pay of officers of the line.
Pay of enlisted men.
Pay of the General Staff (Adjutant-General's Department, Inspector-General's Department, Judge-Advocate-General's Department, and Corps of Engineers).
Pay of the staff (Quartermaster's, Subsistence, Pay, Ordnance, and Signal departments).
Pay of retired officers.
Pay of retired enlisted men.
Miscellaneous; including separate items under the heads of mileage, commutation of quarters, pay of clerks to paymasters, expenses of courts-martial, courts of inquiry, etc.

This analysis has been insisted upon in estimates, and has been embodied in all subsequent acts of appropriation for the support of the military establishment.

The pay clauses in the current act of appropriation for the support of the Army (chapter 2511, act of March 2, 1907; 34 Stat. L., 1159–1165) cover five and one-half pages of the Statutes at Large, in which the several items under the head of pay of the Army are fully and exhaustively analyzed.

The pay clauses of the current act of appropriation for the support of the Navy (chap. 2512, act of Mar. 2, 1907; 34 Stat. L., 1176), cover thirty-six lines of one page, of which eight lines and one word relate to the pay of officers, warrant and petty officers, and seamen, the remaining lines being devoted to other subjects, such as the pay of clerks, hire and commutation of quarters, and certain items of special legislation. The clause relating to the pay of the Marine Corps, which is in another part of the appropriation bill, is itemized along the lines of the Army pay bill, but the analysis of expenditure is much less complete.

The appropriations for the Naval Academy are included in the general act of appropriation for the support of the Navy. The appropriations for the Military Academy are embodied in a separate act of appropriation. The Military Academy bill for the current year (chap. 2508, act of Mar. 2, 1907; 34 Stat. L., 1063) covers ten and three-quarter pages of the Statutes at Large, in which the various items of expenditure are fully analyzed under the several heads of appropriation.

The clause of the naval act of appropriation for the support of the Naval Academy covers two pages of the Statutes at Large, and purports to appropriate, as the apparent total cost of the support of the Academy	$440, 728. 36
To this should be added:
Pay of naval cadets, included in item "Pay of the Navy" (875 cadets, at $500 each)	437, 500. 00
Commutation of rations, appropriated for under the head of "Provisions"	95, 812. 50
	974, 040. 86
Excess of cost of Naval Academy, exclusive of new building construction, over the appropriations carried under the head of "Naval Academy"	533, 312. 50

The number of naval cadets represents the maximum. It is assumed, of course, that there are always vacancies existing, so that the maximum amount is never appropriated. The pay of cadets is appropriated for in great detail in the Military Academy bill. It does not appear in the clauses relating to the Naval Academy in the naval appropriation bill, so that the footing, if not carefully read, would lead to the belief that the money appropriated under the head of the "Naval Academy" covered the entire cost of its support.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senator if he is not willing that my amendment shall take the place of the committee amendment.

Mr. HALE. Certainly not. If the Senator wants to move it as an additional amendment, it is for the Senate to decide.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to have the chairman of the Naval Committee give some expression of views as to the correctness of the suggestions made by the Senator from Wyoming on the amendment he offers.

Mr. HALE. The amendment submitted by the committee has a distinctive range and scope. It does not in any way go into the question how appropriation bills shall be constructed hereafter by the body which initiates them, but it does provide for the information of Congress that at the beginning of the next session, in order that all committees may have notice of its provisions, the Secretary of the Navy shall send to the Senate a schedule which shall cover the pay and allowances of all officers in the Navy, in amounts reckoned in money, and of all petty officers, seamen, and enlisted men, so that at a glance everyone here can see where the money goes, what each rank and grade gets, both in line and staff, and for retired officers and men, and for the petty officers and seamen.

It does not go to the extent of providing that in making up appropriation bills hereafter the House committee shall subdivide all these items and report in detail. The object of the two is entirely different. I do not say that the objects are antagonistic, and if the Senate desires as an additional amendment to embody the provision submitted by the Senator from Wyoming, I shall not object. It will all come up in conference, but I would not want to substitute the Senator's amendment for the amendment of the committee, which has a distinctive purpose in view. Therefore, if the Senator desires to offer his amendment as an additional one to come in after the committee amendment, I shall not make any objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I want to commend the Senator rather than find fault with him for the rapidity with which this bill has been handled and for his desire to have it passed and out of the way, because I know the demands made upon that Senator in connection with other great appropriation bills. There has not been given much time to consider the matter, but while this discussion has been going on I have read both provisions. The Senator is entirely right. They are not antagonistic, but they correspond well together, and one does not take the place of the other. I therefore will offer my amendment to come in at the end of the committee amendment. They do not conflict in any way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. With the consent of the Senator in charge of the bill, I will offer my amendment now.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment has been heretofore read.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber, and would be very glad to have the amendment again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary again read the amendment submitted by Mr. WARREN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, we had some little discussion the other day as to whether or not we would look with a little more care into the details of appropriation bills. The Senator will pardon me, therefore, if I ask him what may appear to be a very trivial question. What is the character of the commissions provided for? I can understand that in some cases interest ought to be paid, but in line 8, page 4, what commissions are referred to?

The provision to which I refer was in the bill as it came from the House, and as was said the other day, Mr. President, we generally take these bills and pay no attention to anything except the Senate amendments. I must confess there is always a great deal in the bills as they come from the House about which I think it would be very well for those of us who are not on the inside to be somewhat informed.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the pay transactions of the Navy of course have grown to be immense. They involve accounts, deposits of money, and drafts in almost every quarter of the globe, and in the transaction of this business there are commissions to be paid, as there are in private transactions. What they amount to I do not know, but I know that they are a necessary adjunct to doing business by drafts and checks, instead of paying money in terms and in currency. These items are all inserted in order that the accounts of the pay department will pass the Comptroller. That is why provision for the payment of commissions and interest—which is charged sometimes—is put in.

Mr. BACON. I think the information is quite satisfactory. I simply desired to know in what particular way this indebtedness is incurred. I suppose I am to understand, from the Senator's statement, that it is in the transmission of funds which are needed in different parts of the world where different parts of our fleet may be.

Mr. HALE. I am trying to take the Senate into my confidence with regard to these matters.

Mr. BACON. I am very much obliged to the Senator. I want to say to the Senator, if he will pardon me, right in that connection, that when the amendment was offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] as to pay, it occurred to me that a similar system might be adopted with some advantage, not only as to the pay, but as to the other expenditures which are provided for in appropriation bills—not this bill in particular, but generally. For instance, we will have a whole body, sometimes two or three pages of items for which expenditures are to be made, with no specification as to the particular magnitude of the expenditure for each particular item, and at the end of two or three pages there will be some such words as "five or six million dollars." There is no possible opportunity for members of the Senate to have any idea whatever as to the correctness of these expenditures. Of course the Senator will not understand me as in any way criticising the committee, but I think these expenditures ought at least be classified.

Take the very next paragraph to the one to which I called the attention of the Senator from Maine. It is made up probably of two or three dozen items. I recognize that it would be impracticable and probably not to be desired that there should be any particular specification of expenditures for each item, but there could be more classification than there is, which would give some opportunity on the part of Senators who are charged with the responsibility of voting for or against this bill to form some idea whether the expenditures are proper or not.

I am very much obliged to the Senator for the promise that he will take us into his confidence. I really think we ought to know something more about these matters than we do. I do not refer particularly to the pending appropriation bill. The Senator is eloquent in his statement to us as to the immense amounts which these appropriation bills involve, and I know of no one in the Senate who can do more to enable the Senate, if possible, to guard against undue expenditures than he can by, as he suggests, taking us into his confidence and letting us know what in each instance is the particular necessity or propriety of the expenditure which is provided for in the bill—I will not say in each instance, but generally, classifying each one.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I notice that accompanying this bill there is quite a brief report, No. 552, and among other things is a tabulation showing the total annual appropriation for the support of the Navy from 1883 to 1907, inclusive. In 1883 the total appropriation was $14,819,976.80. In 1907 the total appropriation was $98,958,507.50, or an increase in twenty-five years of $85,000,000 for the support of the Navy.

The amount carried by the House bill as it came to the Senate was $105,405,768.43, an increase of $6,000,000 over the amount appropriated in 1907. The Senate committee reports an increase in this bill of $7,579,031.45, but there is no statement in this report as to the items of this increase of over seven million and a half dollars. If the Senator will kindly state briefly what that increase consists of, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. HALE. I am very glad to have the Senator ask the question, for I have got the figures here before me. Of course, the largest amount is for the increased pay, which amounts to three million five hundred and odd thousand dollars. Then, accompanying that, are certain small increases in pay to equalize, amounting to about $20,000 in all. For the naval training station at Port Royal there is $50,000; for public works, for which I will say the estimates were something like $15,000,000, $400,000 are appropriated; for Pearl Harbor and the establishment of a naval base, a proposition which passed the House almost or quite unanimously, a million dollars, all these items aggregating $5,157,000. Then three additional colliers are provided for. I should have been glad, if the bill were not so large already, to have made the number six, for I am very deeply impressed with the inadequacy of the American Navy in this feature. I had occasion not long ago to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this great fleet of ours is dependent for its supplies of coal upon foreign colliers that have been hired by the Government. There are twenty-six or twenty-seven ships of other nations to nine or ten or eleven of ours, whichever it may be, used for this purpose. I think this subject has not been sufficiently considered. But the committee has put this item on, which amounts to eighteen hundred thousand dollars. The increase in the Marine Corps——

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HALE. I welcome inquiry.

Mr. MONEY. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine if he proposes to give to the Senate a table to show the proportion of colliers to the fighting fleet of the other nations of the world and our own status in that particular; in other words, the comparison between the coal-carrying capacity of our fleet and that of other fleets in proportion to the fighting capacity of the fleet.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator mean a comparison of our Navy with other navies—of all auxiliary ships—or simply of the colliers to supply coal for these squadrons?

Mr. MONEY. I mean the colliers to supply coal to the fighting fleet, whatever character that fighting fleet may be, whether battle ships, cruisers, torpedo boats, submarine boats, or anything else that is used in action. Has the Senator for the use of the committee any table to show a comparative statement of the capacity of the United States to carry its fuel in proportion to its fighting ships and that of other nations?

Mr. HALE. No; but its actual condition can not perhaps be better illustrated——

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator will permit me, that was to lead up to another question, which was, What is our capacity in coaling stations to supply the lack of these colliers scattered throughout the seas where we cruise?

Mr. HALE. Of course the United States, Mr. President, has not such an elaborate system of coaling stations throughout the seas of the world as has Great Britain. It can not in any way compare with that country, and that is one reason why, if we are to dispatch our fleet not only once, but repeatedly, all over the waters of the globe and circumnavigate the earth, we shall constantly need colliers. I have not the figures which show our lack of colliers as compared with what other nations have, but that is illustrated by the fact that when we started this fleet on this, what I called spectacular cruise, we could not have moved a thousand miles without appealing to other nations to furnish us with colliers, and the proportion, as I stated the other day, is, I think, twenty-six or twenty-seven foreign colliers to ten or eleven of ours.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not wish to anticipate the Senator in anything he may have in reserve. He is now speaking of the necessity for colliers growing out of this spectacular cruise, as he denominates it. I simply desire to know of the Senator whether, before the pending bill is concluded, he will be prepared to give to the Senate, or whether the bill discloses—rather, I will say, whether or not the bill, in connection with the explanation of the Senator, will disclose approximately, if not definitely, what will be the cost of this cruise? In other words, what is the increased expense of the Navy growing out of the cruise? As I say, I will not ask the Senator to reply at present if that will come at a later stage in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HALE. No, sir; it will not, and the country will never know the expense of this cruise for years to come. The wear and tear upon the ships, the depreciation, the accidents, the making good of the long voyage, conducted, as I have reason to believe that it is, in the best and most businesslike manner, will not be known for years. When the ships come back and are docked, and appropriations are first estimated for and then made by Congress in detail, the amount for the first time will then be known. But I can not give the Senator any nearer approach to an estimate of the cost of this trip than could be given of what the total expenditure would be if the Senator should start out upon a cruise around the globe, living in a liberal way and meeting calls and necessities as they arise. I do not think anybody can tell.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I suppose, of course, that the Senator will, as everyone else must, recognize the distinction between the character of the cruise if it is limited to our western coast and the character of the cruise if it is extended around the world, as we now have the intimation from the press, apparently given with authority, will be the extent of that cruise, or rather that it will extend to that globe-circling journey.

Of course it may be possible, and I will say probable, that the cruise of this fleet to our western coast may have had much more substantial cause for it and need for it than would be properly denominated as a spectacular performance. There may be grave considerations which require the fleet to go to the western coast; there may be some advantages in more ways than one in the sending of at least a part of the fleet, or even the whole of it, to the western coast, and it is possible that we may never know—it is impossible for anybody to know—what may be the advantages to result therefrom. But I can quite agree with the Senator that when it comes to sending the fleet around the world it is a spectacular performance, and it may be a very dangerous performance.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. HALE. Of course we are all responsible for our own vocabulary.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. HALE. I did not mean, when I characterized this voyage as spectacular, to indicate that in the minds of the powers that ordered it—Congress did not order it; Congress simply pays the bill—there was not what was believed to be some good object; but, all the same, however good the object, and however good the purpose, the sight of such an immense fleet circuiting all the waters of the globe has never been displayed before by any great or small nation and is a spectacle most remarkable and wonderful, and in that regard is spectacular. So that the characterizing of it does not mean that it was not expected by those who projected it and ordered it to accomplish some real good. Just what that good is we can not tell; and whether it balances the expense, the cost, the burden, we can never know until the fleet turns its prows this way and at last finds moorings in the ports of the United States at home. We have got to wait.

Mr. BACON. I am not in a position to criticise, and I do not wish to be so understood. At the same time, I think there is responsibility upon Senators in some degree to give expression to their views upon a matter which so largely concerns the welfare of the people and the expenses of the country.

I am very frank to say that I can readily, as I have suggested, understand why there may be a very valuable object accomplished in the sending of the fleet to the western coast, although it involves risks and a very large expenditure. I am very frank to say, however, that unless some views are presented to my mind which have not yet occurred to me, that is not true, in my opinion, if the fleet should be sent around the world. That must involve large risks of more kinds than one.

In the first place, if our fleet is needed for protection, it seems to be a very hazardous thing to send it where it would be entirely out of reach, and where it could not be restored to the waters which are adjacent to our country within any reasonable time in case of an emergency. It must result in a very large increase in what the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has suggested as to the wear and tear of these ships. To send these ponderous machines around the world must entail very large expense.

Why, Mr. President, in the simple matter of the fleet passing through the Suez Canal—I have not made an investigation in regard to the matter or asked any one who is in a position to give definite information—I should judge it will cost nearly, if not quite, a million dollars. The tolls on the fleet through the Suez Canal will be between half a million and a million dollars, if not fully a million dollars. I base that estimate upon a very limited knowledge, but still upon something which may be a basis for conclusion. I myself once had the opportunity to go through the Suez Canal on a ship of only 3,500 gross tons burden, and my recollection is that the tolls on that ship were over $13,000. I may be mistaken in my recollection, but I do not think I am in error. Taking that as a basis, we can very readily understand what is going to be the expense for the fleet. I desire to know whether that expense is contemplated in the bill? The ships are measured. The officers come on board and measure a ship and the tolls are according to the size of the ship.

If I am correct in my recollection as to the tolls paid by that little vessel, Senators can form some idea of what sixteen battle ships and all their colliers and all the destroyers going through the Suez Canal will have to pay.

I hope, Mr. President, we are mistaken in the information which we gather from the outgivings of the press as to the intention to send this great fleet around the world. I am perfectly content that it should remain where it is for as long a time as it may be deemed proper that it should remain there; I am perfectly content with the fact that it has been sent there, and have no criticism to make upon it, even though I may have differed in judgment upon the matter; but I do hope that the outgivings of the press are not to be relied upon and that the information is not correct when it is stated that the purpose is to send this great fleet around the world.

It is to be deprecated, in my opinion, upon many grounds. The fleet ought not to be put out of our reach to that extent. It ought not to be subjected to the wear and tear that a voyage around the world will necessarily entail, and the people of the United States ought not to be put to the great expense, millions of dollars over and above what is necessary for the maintenance of that fleet where it now is, which will be involved and entailed if it is sent upon that long journey.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I merely wish to ask the Senator whether the wear and tear of the voyage will be very much greater, if any, than if the fleet was retained in its former waters making the occasional voyages that it necessarily had to make and performing its customary maneuvers. The wear and tear in one instance would not be very much greater, I take it, than in the other, because in both instances the ships are in the water; they are in action, and must be maintained.

Mr. BACON. I am not a nautical expert by any means, and I am not able to answer the Senator with any degree of certainty, but it seems to me that a long voyage of 15,000 or 20,000 miles must necessarily be attended with greater wear and tear, not to the hull of the ship in passing through the water, but to the machinery in its active and powerful exertions, long continued, than when the ship is kept in port and sent a short distance on an occasional trip for one purpose or another or for purposes of maneuvering.

I will say to the Senator from Indiana that the suggestion as to wear and tear did not originate with me. The Senator, I think, was not in his seat at the moment, but in reply to the inquiry made by me the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in summing up what would be the consequences in the way of expense of this voyage mentioned as one of the prominent necessary expenses, something which could not be now estimated, the wear and tear of the ships on the voyage.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is a question I should like to put to the Senator from Maine while the Senator from Georgia is on his feet.

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is whether this Government has sufficient facilities in the Pacific Ocean for overhauling, repairing, dry-docking, and so forth, to keep the fleet in constant condition.

Mr. HALE. I should think not, Mr. President. That, of course, is one of the additional expenses of the voyage. The Senator from Indiana is right in saying that wherever the fleet is there will be wear and tear and the depreciation of strength and utility that goes as a companion of passing years in ships, men, and everything else. But it is added to, undoubtedly, by the long voyage. For instance, in the broad Pacific we have not the opportunity for keeping the ships in good condition that we have if they were kept in our own waters. Whatever is done has to be done in foreign ports and in as limited a way as is possible. But it will all add to the expense.

I should have no doubt in saying to the Senator from Indiana that while everything is not to be attributed to the voyage, there will be a very considerable additional expense. It is rather difficult for one not knowing the magnitude of this enterprise to appreciate that this fleet carries 15,000 men, and the ships, the auxiliaries, the colliers, and the attendant vessels of the different kinds that go to make up what I may call the "retinue" I have seen stated amount to 60 or 70. You can not project such an immense squadron around the globe without having a large additional expense.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Maine permit an interruption?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Maine said there were not facilities for overhauling the fleet while in Pacific waters as there are in our own waters. Perhaps I misunderstood the Senator, because, of course, the Pacific waters are our own waters quite as much as the Atlantic. Our coast line is as long on one ocean as on the other. Besides that, in the Pacific Ocean we have more possessions than we have in the Atlantic and Gulf, too. So if we have not facilities there, it reveals the fact that we ought to have, provided we are going to keep any of our fleet at all upon the Pacific coast.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, that raises another question. That is not a part of the expense of the fleet. It raises another question—how largely we shall go into the establishment of these great naval bases such as England has and which cost millions upon millions of dollars. That opens up another very serious side of what we may have to encounter in the future. We provide, and I think we are obliged to do so, quite an extensive base for naval supplies, repairs, and so forth, in the Hawaiian Islands. Whether we shall hereafter take up Guam and the Philippine Island and spend there tens upon tens of millions of dollars is a question suggested by the inquiry of the Senator from Indiana. We are not doing very much of that upon this bill, because the appropriation is so large that we can not do all of these things in a military way this year.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I want to get back to the question of supplying the fleet with coal. I do not say that I have given any careful study to the question, because I have not. I know nothing about this bill, but I have given to it that casual observation which I presume every Senator here has done from a sense of duty to the country.

Now, I believe it is generally known that the fighting radius of a ship is one-third the distance which her coal will carry her to her fighting point and one-third for the fight and one-third to return to her port—that is, she can go one-third the distance the coal she carries will send her and no farther. That will necessitate, where there is no coal provision of a permanent nature, a large fleet of colliers to attend the ships. It has been demonstrated within the last ten years that you can coal at sea. That was doubted, I believe, up to that time.

I am very much interested in the fact that the ship shall have coal, because without it she is inert and useless. She can neither fight nor run. If we have not a sufficient number of colliers to keep the fleet supplied with coal wherever it may go, taking advantage of coaling stations that may be at our command belonging to us or to any friendly powers, then it is well enough to stop the construction of fighting ships until we have a fleet of colliers sufficient to keep them supplied with power—the life of the ship.

I do not know what information has come to the committee. I presume the bureau of information could furnish something like an approximate estimate of the number of ships required, and it ought to be prepared to furnish an exact estimate, but I do not know whether the committee has the information, and I will ask the Senator from Maine whether the committee has followed the estimate of the Department in this one particular. Has it appropriated for the number of colliers which the Department says is necessary? We know that the present number is extremely inadequate.

Mr. HALE. Yes; they are upon this bill.

Mr. MONEY. All that were estimated for?

Mr. HALE. I have some figures——

Mr. MONEY. Excuse me. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. MONEY. I was asking for information only. I am waiting. I want to know whether the committee has put in this bill the number of colliers estimated for by the Department.

Mr. HALE. The estimate of the Department for four of the big battle ships, costing, as was stated in the debate, when fully completed and ready for sea, something like $11,000,000 each, has been cut down to two.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator will excuse me, I was asking only as to the estimate for colliers.

Mr. HALE. I am leading up to that.

Mr. MONEY. Excuse me.

Mr. HALE. In connection with that and as a part of the policy of not this year adopting the big programme of four battle ships, I may say perhaps in consequence—for it was not a part of the original programme—of the discussion that has arisen, the programme has been cut down to two, and there have been embodied in this bill provisions for five large colliers. I should be in favor not only this year, but hereafter of a moderate programme for battle ships, considering the really very great Navy of battle ships which we now have. I should be in favor hereafter of a moderate programme upon battle ships and a programme for colliers certainly as large as this, and I should be willing to go further than that. I think we ought to equip our fleet with colliers for any emergency, because if there ever shall be an emergency, as we are told may arise, the need of colliers is immensely greater than the need of further battle ships.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. One moment more, if the Senator will allow me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine has yielded to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. MONEY. Excuse me.

Mr. BURROWS. I wish to say a word. The question of colliers being under discussion, I have sought in the different reports to ascertain the exact number of colliers that the United States owns. Unable to find it, I called up the Secretary of the Navy, and he advises me that the United States owns fifteen colliers, and that is all.

Mr. CULLOM. How many are needed?

Mr. BURROWS. I did not inquire into that, but simply asked the number we now have.

Mr. MONEY. I should like to know, supplemental to that information, how many colliers are needed for the fighting fleet of the United States.

Mr. HALE. That depends upon what purpose you put the fleet to.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator from Maine will allow me to say in that particular, the foundation for modern fleets is found in colonies. There would be no great fleet to-day if there were no colonies, no great dependencies which demand battle ships and colliers and all the other machinery of war.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MONEY. We have embarked in this business of having great dependencies, and they are across the globe. We have no real interest in them, and they have less in us. We are holding together over seven and a half millions of people, I believe, entirely foreign to us in every particular, at the loss of several hundred million dollars, with a prospect of increase of expenditure of hundreds of millions more, for the mere pleasure of subjugating somebody else, for the mere pleasure of ruling other people.

Now, is it wise to continue this scheme of dependencies across the globe, or anywhere else so far as that is concerned, without providing for the means to hold them and to resist attacks, because we certainly do put ourselves in the vortex of the wars of the future. War is an integrant in the life of every sovereign nation in the world, and it is not at all necessary that both of the parties to the quarrel shall be wrong any more so than that two individuals meet, one entirely in the wrong and the other entirely in the right, and they have a quarrel, and fight. So this is one of the necessary incidents of the life of a sovereign people, and the difficulty can be no more anticipated than a personal quarrel on the street can be anticipated.

Look how suddenly we had war clouds loom up in the Far East because of the action of the school board in the city of San Francisco, pursuing an undoubted right that belonged to the State, not only inherently, but inalienably, of policing its own matters, of regulating its own schools, without regard to the United States or Japan or anybody else in the world. And yet it seemed to us, from what we heard, that it was necessary for the authorities of the State of California to retrogress from the position which they undoubtedly had the right to take in order that we might avoid difficulty with Japan. Now, it is not so far a cry from Nagasaki or Yokohama to Manila; I suppose about twelve or fifteen hundred miles. I do not know exactly.

Mr. BACON. Not so much as that.

Mr. MONEY. Not so much as that, my traveled friend, the Senator from Georgia, says. I think myself it is about 1,500 miles, but he knows better. Half way is the island of Formosa, which was an indemnity the Japanese received from the Chinese in the war of 1894. That is a beautiful island of 13,000 square miles, with over 3,000,000 people, and would constitute a tremendous base of military operations against our possessions in the Philippines. The Japanese navy never expects or intends to leave Pacific waters. We have to divide our Navy into two parts, and we are compelled, if we keep the Philippines, to have two great navies where we should have only one. If we drop the policy of maintaining our Government over the Philippines, we blot out the expectation of war in that quarter. We absolutely throw a safeguard around the whole Pacific coast.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Mississippi permit me to ask a question?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator stated very correctly a moment ago the difficulty that arose between this country and Japan over the action of the California authorities with respect to schools.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, we are unable to hear what is going on in the Chamber.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Mississippi a moment ago very clearly showed that a war can be no more anticipated than a quarrel between two men, one being in the right and the other being in the wrong, or regardless of that fact. He illustrated that by the difficulty, which now happily has passed, that this country had or was about to have with Japan over the school question in San Francisco. The Senator said that the State was by force of circumstances compelled to recede from the position which it had taken in order, as he says, to avoid difficulty with Japan.

Now, the question I have to ask the Senator is this: Suppose the school board of San Francisco first had declined and the authorities of the State had declined to recede from the position they first took in the matter of Japanese school children; and Japan having notified us, perhaps unofficially, but anyhow notified us, that she considered this a violation of our treaty with her, asked us for a redress we could not give. Then does not the Senator think, as I understood him to say, that war with Japan would have been very natural and quite probable?

Mr. MONEY. No; I do not think so, because there are always circumstances which alter conditions and make what would be probable in one case impossible in another. There are motives and motives, and, in my opinion—I do not know whether I am correct or not; very likely I am wrong—there was something more than the exclusion of the Japanese from the white schools in California——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think so, too.

Mr. MONEY. Because that was no infringement of any treaty right.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Quite so.

Mr. MONEY. I am a little bit familiar with the treaties, and I know what I am talking about, I think. There was no infringement of any right. They had no ground under any treaty existing or which ever did exist to claim that right. But there was something behind it, and Japan was ready to provoke a quarrel, not to secure the entrance of her own citizens into the schools of the city of San Francisco, but because there was something else she wanted, and this might be the casus belli and not the real cause of the war. In other words, it might furnish the occasion and not the cause. That is quite true. But to remove the temptation——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Before the Senator——

Mr. MONEY. Excuse me for a moment. Japan was probably brought to a realization of her disadvantage in that quarrel because it happened very fortunately for us, and very opportunely, that the same difficulty arose in British Columbia, and Japan being in a treaty of alliance, defensive and offensive, with Great Britain she was suddenly brought to consider the fact that her only western ally was holding the same position that we did in California, and that there was the same prejudice of race in British Columbia as was manifested in the city of San Francisco. That no doubt helped Japan to realize that it was a larger proposition than she originally entertained.

Now, I want to say in addition that if we are to keep these colonies it is perfectly idle to talk about a small navy or a small army. If we insist upon this colonial system—it is not a colony—this dependency business, we must conclude that we are going to maintain a navy in the Pacific just as large as Japan will ever put afloat, because she is the power we have to meet.

I recollect also that a semiofficial announcement was made in London that Great Britain would be true to her alliance, whatever the consequences to the United States. Whether that was published by inspiration I do not know, but I know it was published.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Whether the school incident was bona fide or whether it had a concealed and hidden reason behind it, still unpleasantness was impending for some cause.

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly; and whatever we may conclude about it—and I do not as a Senator assume to charge another power with having a concealed motive——

Mr. MONEY. Or no other power.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No. The fact of the possibility of conflict very suddenly flamed up, as the Senator said.

Now, in case the unhappy circumstance had eventuated that these events led up to, as the Senator says, a very large navy would have been necessary, not only to protect our honor, but to defend our safety.

Mr. MONEY. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Pacific Ocean is as much American waters as the Atlantic.

Mr. MONEY. I understand that. Nobody has said to the contrary. Here is the point I am getting at. We are maintaining a condition here of our own will which we can terminate at our own pleasure. That condition enforces a large Army and a large Navy, unless we have the lack of wisdom to prepare for what is, as I said, an incident of every nation in the world.

I recollect that De Witt, the grand pensionary of Holland, once said very wisely that his people loved liberty and were not afraid to fight, but that they were too stingy in time of peace to prepare for war. Consequently they were always taken advantage of by their enemies, whether German or French or Spanish. I will not say that of the American people, because they are not stingy at any time; but we are a people who are laboring under a great deal of taxation. We want to minimize the burden that every man must carry in this country. Therefore people who consider the welfare of all the people do not want the extraordinary burden of a large navy and a large army, but if we maintain the condition that in wisdom demands these things, what are we going to do? You can not disarm in the face of the foe. You can not hold yourself in unreadiness for anything that may transpire.

I do not want a large navy or a large army per se. But I do not believe it is the part of wisdom to discontinue a liberal enlargement of the Navy, and of the Army, too. I am not one of those people who want a large army. I do not want it to be possible to say here, like it is said of the German people or other European people, that every man carries a soldier on his back.

We do not here want any burden at all in the race for life. We want to strip our people, if possible, of every incumbrance of taxation and everything else. We want to divest our people of the fear of anything that might come like war, which is always a catastrophe, I do not care whether it is successful or not, because it demoralizes the whole country, although I will not say that war has not its uses also, because it brings out the heroic and manly and patriotic impulses of the people and consumes as in a fire the grosser spirit and purifies the people who struggle in it.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine still permitting me to go on, as I have said, I do not understand the bill. I have not read it. I told him some time ago, I believe, that in these matters I depend upon his own good judgment; that I thought I would follow him in this whole matter. I suppose I will. I will vote with him. But it does seem to me that all those of us who believe we ought not to increase the Army and Navy of the United States beyond its present limits and ought to vote to decrease it in order to lessen the burdens of taxation upon the people, should immediately take some steps to terminate our relations with these worse than useless dependencies.

Long ago everybody realized that a mistake was made. Long ago everybody believed that this talk about trying to convert those people to the Christian religion, from the Roman Catholic to the Protestant in most of them, but in a small part from Mohammedanism to Christianism, was mere cant. Nobody but missionaries and preachers believed in it. The statesmen did not believe in it, but they wanted to utilize it because of the moral power in this country; that is all. Nobody now believes that we ever cared a straw about the welfare of the Filipinos, or whether they had any good government. As a matter of fact, we are here to take care of the American people and no others. This is not a parliament of man or a federation of the world here. It is simply the American Congress. This is a part of it. If we can drop our relations with those people, then we have, I think, withdrawn entirely an incentive to war in that quarter, and we can diminish the Navy there to a very small proportion.

The expense of fortifying Hawaii has been talked about, and I believe a million dollars has been appropriated for Pearl Harbor. That is a wise provision. The fact that we own that mid-ocean outpost is to say that we command the Northern Pacific Ocean, and to say also that we need not expend hundreds of millions of dollars to fortify cities on the Pacific coast. With that properly fortified, coaled, and garrisoned there will be no danger from any attack on our Pacific possessions. As I said, we would take away the inducement to war by dropping our relations with the Philippine Islands, but as long as we persist in this policy, so long will we willfully incur the risk that must come to us by its continuance. Then, I do not believe that it is wise to talk about cutting down the naval expenditures. I can not for the life of me understand how we are going to avoid responsibility.

I do not believe that ten years will roll away before we will have a fight with Japan for something. I do not know what the cause will be, and nobody else does. I make no claim for any prevision whatever in the matter, but I have been a student of history, which is only philosophy teaching by example, and I have learned from that that these wars come around very frequently when probably no one is to blame about it. I recollect what I said on this floor in answering Mr. Stewart, of Nevada, who wanted just at that time to double the Navy for the express purpose, he said, of preventing Germany from taking the Philippine Islands. Without knowing any more about the bill than I do about this, but upon this general policy, I stated that there was not the slightest danger from Germany, but that the Japanese who were then about to engage in a war with Russia would defeat her on sea and land. That prediction came true. Then, I said, having expanded continentally, she would desire to expand insularly.

The papers yesterday or to-day bring us news that she has now a large fleet on the Chinese coast, because of the threatened boycotting of Japanese by Chinese merchants, and the Japanese boat which was seized has been turned back with an ample apology to Japan. Their readiness for war is unquestioned. Their desire for it is unquestioned. Their courage is undisputed, and I want to say it has never been exceeded in any history I have ever read in my life. Their physical endurance is a marvel. I do not depreciate the valor and courage and resources of this country, because no country on earth has as great, in my opinion; but there is a tremendous army with not one drunkard in the army, nor a guardhouse in the whole army. What is the punishment? If a soldier is disorderly or turbulent or disobedient he is not permitted to go into the next battle. That is the severest punishment known in the Japanese army. What is the result? Tears and cries and begging and all that sort of thing, and then at last, if permission is not granted, he commits hari-kari, and that is the end of the matter and of his dishonor.

Those people go to the lyceum at 5 in the morning and at 9 p. m., and so at the university at Tokyo. They are turned out of the lyceum capable of entering the service. Their traits have made them the most enduring people in the world. You can take the best regiment in the American Army—and I pay honor to the American soldier, in resources, in natural courage, which are the commonest qualities in the American soldier; I notice he never lacks them and is conspicuous in them in battle, and I have been in a good many myself. Granting all that, you may take the crack regiment of the United States and run it a mile double-quick, and I can go in and kill them with a baseball bat; they will be completely exhausted. Yet when the first Japanese army crossed the Yalu River—some of them swam and some waded—they ran at double-quick across 3 miles of barren sand over their shoe tops, and climbed up the escarpment, protected by live wires and barbed wires and everything else, and with every kind of artillery and gun, automatic and rifle, and everything else firing at them all the way across, scaled to the summit, and drove out the Russians to the ditches, where they retired.

I do not exaggerate the Japanese capacity for fighting. I think everybody will well understand it. I want to say, gentlemen, whenever we tackle that little nation of brown men we are going to have all we can do. It is not worth while to say that our fleet will pass through the Isthmus or around the Cape of Good Hope or any way to get back into the Atlantic waters, but you have got to keep that sized navy there if you hold on to the Philippines. We might just as well have the Navy come around to this side—the most of it—and sever our relation with the Philippines and say "Godspeed." We need not be uneasy about their being able to take care of themselves. Every nation in the world is capable of independence. They are not going to govern themselves as we do, because they have not the concept of government that we have.

I want to say also that we are not complimenting any nation in the world by any imitation. The Swiss Confederation is nothing but a confederation governed by different methods peculiar to different parts of it, but really governed by the great parliament of Europe, her frontiers equally distributed and all that sort of thing, and yet she will maintain herself very gallantly by her own efforts.

France can not be said to be so, because it is militarism more than anything else, and a great many people are afraid of that here. I am not afraid of it as far as I am concerned, but I simply do not want the increased burden of maintaining a very large army and a very large navy. I do hope that this Congress, if not now, will at some time see to it that either we have stripped ourselves to a small army and a small navy or that we have prepared for any emergency that large possessions may entail upon us.

Mr. President, I did not intend to make these remarks. I simply wanted the information I thought my friend from Maine had about the number of colliers, because my attention was very forcibly directed to it by a magazine article by Park Benjamin not long since, and I presumed the bureau of information had furnished the committee with everything that was needed. I hope the Senator will have, before he concludes the bill, a statement of the battle ships and the cruisers, armored and protected, and the submarines and torpedo boats and torpedo-boat destroyers, the colliers, and everything else that belongs to the different nations of the world.

Mr. HALE. I have the statement right here.

Mr. MONEY. I am very happy to hear that. I think the Senator will find that in proportion to the colonies is the size of the Navy. Great Britain did not get to be such a great maritime country until she had colonies. Spain swept the ocean when she colonized the earth. So the Phœnicians had no great navy until they colonized Africa and a part of Spain and Sicily. The Greeks did nothing in the way of a navy, although half of them were on islands, until they, too, began to colonize southern Italy, eastern Sicily, a part of southern France, and other countries. It is only when you begin to have great dependencies that you are compelled to have a big navy, but if you do have dependencies you must have a navy. There is no use to talk about a navy with an army that is commensurate with it, because when you have the navy at one part there might be an invasion from another part of our coast. We are not impervious to attack. We have thousands upon thousands of miles of continental coast line as well as that in our dependencies now, and all are to be taken care of in some way.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There are something over twelve thousand miles.

M. MONEY. There are something over twelve thousand miles, my friend from Indiana tells me, and I have no doubt he is correct, as he usually is. All that has got to be considered. The stories you see in the newspapers about a probable invasion when our fleet is absent, of course, work on the imagination, and they are so susceptible of realization that it is very well for us to take heed of them.

I do not want to make a speech on this matter, and I have insensibly, as sometimes other people do, drifted on the current of my own thought. That is all. But I am glad to know the Senator from Maine has got these estimates, that we may know exactly how we stand. While we are the first nation of the world in resources, yet, unfortunate for us, the modern war is extremely short. Germany prostrated Austria in a six weeks' campaign and one battle. She prostrated France, the greatest military power, it was thought, in Europe, in a campaign of two months. So the wars of late have been short wars. We drove Spain off the earth almost in two months. It was my prophecy also that that war would not last over two months and would be a naval war. I think still we never ought to have sent our men to Cuba; but Cuba was willing to admit them. The whole thing was a useless sacrifice, in my opinion, then as now, and I so advised the President, who did me the honor to ask me about it, I having had some acquaintance with the island.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was not fortunate enough to hear the beginning of this discussion in regard to the voyage of the fleet to our western coast, but from what I did hear I gathered that it has been criticised. As I am one of those who think that voyage a very valuable thing to the Navy, and very wisely undertaken, I wish to say a word in regard to it.

It is not enough in a navy to have the units the best in the world. We have, no doubt, a large number of ships of the very highest class; probably they average better than any other navy in the world to-day, with fewer of an obsolete type among them and fewer useless ships. But the units are not enough. It is necessary in order to have a really efficient navy to have an efficient fleet. The units must be massed and grouped and able to act together as a fleet.

I will venture to say, speaking now of the Navy of the last few years, that we have never until this year produced an efficient fleet. I think this voyage has created the fleet. I think it has done more for the Navy and for the personnel than anything that has been undertaken for the development of our Navy as a fighting force.

I happened to see a letter from one of the principal officers in command of the fleet, and I was greatly interested in what he said there as to the effect of the voyage on the personnel of the fleet—on the crews, on the officers, and on all branches of the service. He also pointed out what I think is a very important thing, that this long voyage, far removed from navy-yards and naval stations, had compelled the officers and men on the ships to make the necessary repairs for the slight injuries or defects which were disclosed in so long a cruise; that an immense amount of work had been done, and thoroughly done, on the ships while they were actually at sea or when they stopped to coal, which, if they had been at the Atlantic port, would have meant their running into the nearest navy-yard and having the repairs made there. It rendered the entire mechanical force on the ships more efficient than it had ever been before.

I think the success of the voyage and the fleet which has been developed by it are of immense value not only to the Navy, but to the country, and I believe it is one of the greatest instruments for the maintenance of peace that we have had produced in many years.

Now, Mr. President, as to the Navy being the result of our possessing the Philippine Islands and the island of Guam, it seems to me that they have no bearing on it at all. I do not think if we were to abandon the Philippines to-morrow, or if we had never had them, it would make the slightest difference as to the fleet we need.

The drift of the debate here to-day has seemed to indicate that when we are sending the fleet where it is at this moment we are sending it to strange waters and on account of distant Pacific possessions.

Mr. President, the fleet to-day is in home waters. The Pacific coast is just as much a part of the United States and just as necessary to our welfare as the Atlantic coast.

I am a dweller on the Atlantic coast, and I am very glad that the American Navy in this great and imposing fleet has gone to the Pacific coast.

This is not the place to discuss war or the rumors of war or the attitude of other nations, but I observed when the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] was telling the Senate what dangers might arise from our dependencies, the only instance of a casus belli or a possible casus belli which he suggested was something that had occurred on the coast of the United States and not in any outlying island. There has never been any difficulty with a foreign nation arising out of the Philippine Islands or from Guam or from Hawaii, so far as I am aware.

We need a great fleet for the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast of the United States, and wherever the fleet is it ought to be one fleet, unless we are prepared to keep two of equal size, one on each coast of the United States. Nothing could be more foolish than the division of the fleet and having part of it here and part of it there.

Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me that no wiser thing could have been done than to have sent the fleet on this voyage, for the purpose of developing the American fleet, making it a fleet in action, and getting once for all beyond the stage of the naval unit of a single ship.

Mr. President, it is very true that a great navy is a great expense. Fortunately we do not need a large army. There is no need of a greater army than we have to-day. It ought not to be increased. We have no neighbors to threaten us.

But the Navy is the guaranty of our peace and our safety. It is better than all the forts that can be constructed. A strong navy means, to my mind, the absolute peace of the United States. I think there is nothing more unsound than the idea that because the Navy is a large one therefore it is a temptation to war, and that because we build more ships we are encouraging war. It is the weak navy and the unprotected power which gets into war. A great, opulent country, with a brave and aggressive people like our own, is an easy and inviting prey, if it is not well defended.

I happened to stumble some time ago upon an article by Charles Dickens, written more than fifty years ago, long since forgotten, but brought out in his collected works lately. It is called "Proposals for Amusing Posterity," and I took from it this paragraph. This, remember, was back in the fifties, and addressed, of course, to his own people:

> And I would suggest that if a body of gentlemen, possessing their full phrenological share of the combative and antagonistic organs, could only be induced to form themselves into a society for declaiming about peace, with a very considerable war whoop against all non-declaimers; and if they could only be prevailed upon to sum up eloquently the many unspeakable miseries and horrors of war, and to present them to their own country as a conclusive reason for its being undefended against war, and becoming a prey of the first despot who might choose to inflict those miseries and horrors, why, then, I really believe we should have got to the very best joke we could hope to have in our whole complete jest book for posterity and might fold our arms and rest convinced that we had done enough for that discerning patriarch's amusement.

I think, Mr. President, that in that statement there is a great deal of good sense and a happy argument to show that the way to peace is in the complete defense of the country. Our complete defense, fortunately for us, requires provision really only on one element. We are not obliged to keep a great force on the land, but we must always have a great and powerful navy, as we have to-day. We ought also to have it always in the highest state of efficiency, and to that I believe this voyage has largely contributed. If we have a powerful and efficient navy I believe we are thereby possessed of the greatest guaranty for the peace of the United States which can be devised and of an insurance of that peace, which is cheaply bought by whatever money we appropriate for so vital an object.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for but a moment or two in attempting to analyze the exact and not the imaginary condition in which we find ourselves, as pointed out by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

The Senator from Mississippi, with that learning which always characterizes everything he says, has presented, perhaps, the most radical view of those who are opposed to a great navy, and therefore there is peculiar significance in what he so clearly and weightily said about the absolute necessity for a great navy if we have the Philippines. If we keep the Philippines, he said, a great navy is indispensable.

Of course, I do not intend to enter into any discussion of what our Philippine policy should be, but I desire merely, upon the premises established by the Senator from Mississippi, who is against both having the Philippines, on the one hand, and a large navy, on the other hand, but in favor of a great navy if we are to retain the Philippines, to point out exactly the situation in which we find ourselves now, whatever we might otherwise wish it to be, and the situation which must confront us for many years to come.

Everyone in this body knows, Mr. President, what my own personal position is upon the Philippines, and I do not intend in anywise to advocate it here and now. It is neither the time nor the occasion. But, taking it for granted that if we have the Philippines to defend for any reason, therefore we require a large navy, as the Senator from Mississippi asserts, I think I shall be able to prove in a moment that if that statement is true, then we are under the sternest necessity to have a great navy at once and for many years to come.

First, Mr. President, there has not been heard from any side any proposition for the immediate abandonment of the Philippines.

Upon one hand the policy of one great political party, so far as it has been outlined, is that they shall be retained until the people in them are capable of self-government, and that that is an event many decades in the future. So, if the position of that party is correct, we have the Philippines upon our hands for a generation to come as a trust placed upon us by humanity, civilization, and liberty itself.

On the other hand the position of the other great political party, as voiced by its twice candidate and soon-again-to-be candidate for President, and as expressed in its platform, is this: That the Filipinos shall be given exclusive charge of their own affairs, and that we shall protect them in their territorial independence.

But the protection of the Filipinos in their territorial independence plainly involves a greater degree of offensive and defensive preparedness upon our part than holding them outright. No sooner had that proposition been made than it was pointed out that if the separate and independent Philippine government should borrow money from other powers, as all new and old governments always must and always have borrowed money, and should default in the payment of its bonds, then the creditor government would have a right, unless we adopt the Drago doctrine, to descend and capture its ports, which means a practical administration of the government. Very well. Then, under our pledge to it to maintain its independence intact, we should either have to pay its debts or go to war to defend it.

So that, from the point of view of either political party, according to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], a great navy, a very great navy, is necessary for many years to come for the single reason of the Philippines, no matter which party's policy we may adopt. Whether we adopt the view of Mr. Bryan and the Democratic party, which seems to me totally impracticable, or the view of the other party, still their defense is on our hands as a trust brought to us by events and a duty owed by us to humanity, to the world, and to history.

But, Mr. President, I do not think the reasons for a great navy, which, I think, will perhaps be more fully discussed later on in this debate, are by any manner of means confined to any policy we may adopt with reference to the Philippines. I heartily agree with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that, irrespective of the Philippines, a great navy, a much greater navy, a much more efficient navy than we have to-day is absolutely necessary and is dictated by our interests and compelled by the consideration which every patriot should have for the honor of his country.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] referred to our coast line. We have as a continental coast line something, I think, over 12,000 miles, or near that—far more than all that of England and France and Germany and Spain combined; almost twice as much, I believe, as all of them combined; more, perhaps, than any other three nations in the world combined. Later on in this debate perhaps it may be necessary to point out, as the Senator from Mississippi pointed out, how easy and how unexpected are the occasions for war, which every humane man deprecates, and then, if it should come, how unprepared our coasts, our people, and the treasure they have accumulated are to meet that conflict. If such an event did come—and the history of the world shows that no man can safely predict that it will not come—we should expend in sheer money, of which we hear so much talk, more in ten days than would maintain for fifty years a much greater navy than we have now, to say nothing of the lives that would be lost, the business that would be interrupted, and civilization itself which would be turned back.

Mr. President, this debate, of course, is only for the moment and sprung up upon a criticism of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] of the voyage of our fleet. I was not in the Chamber when the remark of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that it was a spectacular voyage, which apparently inspired the criticism of the Senator from Georgia, was made, but I heard the lucid statement of the Senator from Georgia and the informing reply of the Senator from Maine. All we heard concerning that voyage was as to its expense—its money expense. It was costing money, they said—as though a fleet or anything else could be maintained without funds.

There would be wear and tear, they declared; but of course there would be wear and tear if the fleet were kept within what the Senator from Maine inadvertently called our home waters, which apparently referred merely to the Atlantic coast. You can not maintain the fleet in dry dock, nor can you permit it to rust and go out of commission because of disuse in friendly ports. Even if maintained upon the Atlantic coast, it has its necessary journeys to make. So, we heard nothing except about the expense of this voyage; how much it would cost to go through the Suez Canal, and not one word was said of the very great material benefits which, on a moment's reflection, are apparent to all, and of the infinitely greater sentimental benefits which are far more valuable than the other.

I said "upon a moment's reflection," Mr. President, that the benefits of this voyage would be apparent to all. For a great many years—I think ever since James G. Blaine first gave the great impetus to that policy—we have been doing all we could to establish the most friendly possible relations with the South American Republics. We wanted them, first, to recognize our friendship, and we wanted them, second, to have respect for the power that is behind our justice. Much progress has been made in the last two years in that respect. Perhaps no policy of this or any other former Administration has been so beneficial from a historic point of view as the policy which was announced two years ago with respect to South America. It will result ultimately in a continental solidarity, an American sisterhood of nations. It will result in the greatest possible benefit for our mutual commerce and for the peace of the world.

Well, Mr. President, at this almost psychological moment, from the point of view of what may properly be called "world politics" or "international politics," so far as this hemisphere is concerned, our fleet started upon this historic voyage. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] said that never in the history of the world had any power ever sent any such fleet upon such a journey, and of course that is quite true; but that is no argument against our making it. From the establishment of our Republic down to the civil war and the reorganization of our nation after it, most of the things we have done have been unprecedented in history. Those things of which we are proudest, those things which stand out in history as American have had no precedents, and I for one pray that the time will never come when this nation loses that initiative which makes our efforts known throughout the world as peculiarly American; I pray the time may never come when we shall become so bound to precedent that our inventiveness, our resourcefulness, and our spirit of enterprise shall be palsied, as have those of the nations of the Orient and until recently the nations of Europe themselves.

So the fact that no other power ever sent such a fleet on such a journey is no argument against it. No! Rather will it predispose the American people to favor it. We are rather glad to do those things that have not been done before, if they add to our progress or to the welfare of the world.

Now, what about the sentimental benefit of this fleet's voyage? It visited South America, and the first port it made brought out from that nation, in which the port was located, more tangible honor to the American flag than has ever been paid to it in the whole history of the Western Hemisphere. Those manifestations from Rio de Janeiro clear around through the Magellan Strait, up again into Pacific-American waters, were not merely governmental; they were popular. It was the people who were doing us honor, and does any man, no matter how much he may be against the voyage of this fleet, question in his heart and his judgment that the people of South America to-day entertain for us a respect that is beyond all calculation in mere money and that will contribute not only to our peaceful relations but to the extension of our commerce? Mr. President, I apprehend that as the fleet proceeds and visits other countries the same fortunate and happy consequences will flow from its journey.

There is another advantage far beyond the cash yardstick to measure, and that is this: Before that fleet started there was a great deal of talk—continuous talk, increasing talk, inflammatory talk, which I think every thoughtful man in the United States deprecated—of war as liable to come upon us. It was in the newspapers; it was in the magazines; it was the common talk of the furrow, of the street, of the store, of the shop, and of the household. We read in the foreign dispatches that this common talk here was even greater in other capitals and throughout other countries of the world. Everybody knows that even a personal disturbance often grows out of the talk that it will occur. Everybody who has read history knows that that also has unfortunately been so with reference to nations.

I remember having seen many brilliant and able editorials, particularly in the New York newspapers, as to the certainty of this voyage precipitating this conflict, which, it was said, was already prepared to descend upon us. Well, Mr. President, the fleet had no sooner reached the Pacific waters than, from some cause or other, war talk, so far as the people, so far as the press, and so far as the other capitals of the world were concerned, decreased immediately, and it has almost vanished. Instead of making the talk of war greater, instead of bringing upon us a conflict which the whole world dreaded, the apprehension has been lifted from two shores of the Pacific and from three continents, and I make no doubt, if the journey of the fleet thus far may be a prophecy of its beneficent close and its happy home-coming, that our prospects of peace with the world and the prospect of the whole world's peace with itself will have been increased from this great voyage of our white squadron, which, flying the flag of the most powerful nation in the world, also flies the flag of the most peaceful nation in the world—a nation peaceful not only because we desire peace above everything else, but because we are strong enough and determined enough to maintain our desire for peace by force, and to repel any attack against it.

It occurs to me to be proper in referring to the criticism of the Senator from Georgia, which upon his part was entirely proper, to call attention to the fact that this voyage is not to be measured by mere questions of the oil put upon the gearing of the ships, by the coal burned, by the bearings worn out, by the necessities of repairs, and by the tolls for passage throughout the Suez Canal; but by considerations so much greater, not only in business but in sentiment, that these little items, necessary as they are for our consideration, absolutely disappear in the broader sweep of this larger vision.

The Senator from Massachusetts said that our fleet must be maintained as one, unless we are to have two fleets, but he also followed that by a statement that shows that we must face—and I see no reason why we should not gladly face—the policy of having two fleets. That is no great hardship, considering our numbers and our resources. If little England can maintain a channel squadron, a Mediterranean squadron, an Atlantic squadron, a Pacific squadron, and one in the Indian Ocean, certainly this great Republic, infinitely larger than Great Britain in area, in resources, in population, and in everything that goes to add to the wealth of nations, can maintain two fleets, one upon each of our two coasts.

The Pacific coast is as much American as the Atlantic coast. We have grown into the habit of regarding American waters as the waters between New Brunswick and the Florida keys. We have come to consider our only proper naval stations as between Mount Desert and Tampa. But the Pacific coast, stretching from Vancouver Island clear down to where California ends, is quite as much American. We are quite as much concerned in it, its development, the safety of its people, and the forwarding of its trade and all of its interests, as we are in those of the people who live upon the Atlantic coast.

I myself, like some other Senators here, happen to live in the heart of the Republic. No navy ever can bombard us in the Mississippi Valley, at least as far down as St. Louis. We can not be invaded by foreign foe, and yet the Representatives upon this floor of Illinois and Indiana and other neighboring States think just as much of the people who live upon the Atlantic seaboard as they do of their own people, because they are equally American with us; and, by the same token, we care as much for the people who live on the Pacific coast as we do for the people upon the Atlantic or for ourselves. If, then, it is conceded that we have been right, as it has been conceded here by everyone this afternoon, in building up our present Navy for the Atlantic, surely an equal Navy is not out of place for the Pacific.

Mr. President, I think that the force of opinion of the American millions would keep that fleet in the Pacific were it not for the single fact brought out by my question to the Senator from Maine, that we do not now have what we should have—the facilities for caring for it upon that coast and in those waters. Our negligence in that respect—in respect of dry docks, in respect of naval stations, in respect of all things necessary to take care of our Navy—will come back to us with awful force in case we ever unfortunately should be engaged in a conflict in the Pacific Ocean. The people will then say, "Why did you not prepare for this? Why not only have ships not been built, but why also have not facilities for caring for those ships been prepared?" And what answer will you make—you who have prevented those preparations which prudence dictates and the people demand?

Mr. President, a great navy commensurate with our needs, not only upon the Atlantic, but upon the Pacific also, is the certainty of the future. It is a certainty because it is dictated not only by the wisdom of our own situation, but by conditions throughout the world, and, more than all else, by our determination to maintain, so far as we and our interests are concerned, peace with honor. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. HALE. Now, let us see if we can make some progress with the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Bureau of Navigation," on page 8, line 18, after the word "seamen," to insert: "Provided, That the sum of $4,564.05 is hereby appropriated for the equipment and maintenance of the dispensary, said sum to be immediately available;" and in line 22, after the word "all," to strike out "$60,652," and insert "$65,216.05," so as to make the clause read:

Naval training station, California: Maintenance of naval training station, Yerba Buena Island, California, namely: Labor and material; buildings and wharves; general care, repairs, and improvements of grounds, buildings, and wharves, wharfage, ferriage, and street-car fare; purchase and maintenance of live stock, and attendance on same; wagons, carts, implements, and tools, and repairs to same; fire engines and extinguishers; boats and gymnastic implements; models and other articles needed in instruction of apprentice seamen; printing outfit and materials, and maintenance of same; heating, lighting, and furniture; stationery, books, and periodicals; fresh water, and washing; packing boxes and materials; and all other contingent expenses; lectures and suitable entertainments for apprentice seamen: Provided, That the sum of $4,564.05 is hereby appropriated for the equipment and maintenance of the dispensary, said sum to be immediately available; in all, $65,216.05.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 16, to insert:

Naval training station, Port Royal, S. C.: Maintenance of naval training station, Port Royal, S. C., namely: Manual labor and material; general care, repairs, and improvements of grounds, buildings, and wharves; wagons, carts, implements, and tools, and repairs to same; gymnastic implements; models and other articles needed in instruction of apprentice seamen; stationery, books, periodicals, and other contingent expenses; necessary repairs to the buildings now erected to fit them for berthing, messing, and drilling purposes, and for galleys, latrines, and washhouses; for purposes of administration in connection with the training of apprentice seamen; in all, naval training station, Port Royal, S. C., $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 7, to insert:

For badges and ribbons to be distributed by the Secretary of the Navy to officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps who have participated in engagements and campaigns deemed worthy of such commemoration, $3,500, to be available until used.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 12, to insert:

Officers in the various staff corps of the Navy shall hereafter have actual rank and title as now established for the staff corps of the Army. Such officers of the staff corps of the Navy shall at all times have the title and designation of their rank, and new commissions in accordance therewith shall be forthwith issued to them: Provided, That this provision shall in no case carry with it command over any vessel of the Navy Department, but such command shall be exercised only by line officers.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator——

Mr. HALE. I want to ask, as several Senators have requested, that the proviso on page 13, from line 12 to line 21, inclusive, shall be passed for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 11 on page 16.

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask the Senator a question, to see if I understood him correctly. When the Senator suggested that the amendment on page 13 be passed over, did he mean to include the matter from line 8 down?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. BACON. Only from line 13?

Mr. LODGE. From line 13 to line 21.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, the question I wish to propound to him is in reference to the amendment which preceded that. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the language in line 12, which makes the appropriation "available until used." While it is a very small matter and relates to a very immaterial provision, still it is an important constitutional requirement that no appropriation shall be made which shall exceed two years for the support of the Army or Navy; and while, as I say, it is an exceedingly small matter, nevertheless it falls within the principle, and I think it so important a principle that it should be guarded even in small matters. It is a constitutional requirement that no appropriation for this purpose shall be made for a time exceeding two years, and this item makes an indefinite appropriation.

Mr. HALE. Strike out the words "until used."

Mr. BACON. "Immediately available" I have no objection to.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. BACON. Or "available for two years" I have no objection to.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to the suggestion.

Mr. BACON. But it certainly is in contravention of the requirement of the Constitution as the provision now stands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be regarded as open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. Put in before the word "available" the word "immediately."

Mr. BACON. And strike out——

Mr. HALE. And strike out "until used."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, on page 13, line 12, before the word "available," to insert "immediately," and after the word "available" to strike out "until used."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 32, line 22, after the word "dollars," to strike out "in all, $156,000" and insert "naval prison extension, $65,000; quay walls extension, $25,000; in all, $246,000," so as to make the clause read:

Navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H.: Sewer system, extension, $6,500; to complete blasting in front of quay wall, $60,000; storehouse for combustibles, $30,100; railroad extension, $10,000; heating system, extension, $20,000; electric plant, extension, $20,000; steam main central power plant to steam engineering plant, $9,000; naval prison extension, $65,000, quay walls, extension, $25,000; in all, $246,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 23, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to expend toward the general improvement of the water front at the navy-yard, New York, N. Y., the unexpended balance of the appropriation made by the act approved June 17, 1900, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, for the construction of a bascule bridge at said navy-yard: Provided further, That the limit of cost of dry dock No. 4 at the navy-yard, New York, N. Y., is hereby fixed at $1,500,000, and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, in his discretion, to construct said dry dock by contract or day labor, or both, as he may deem to be for the best interests of the Government.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine whether that is an item which has been brought to the attention of the Senate committee or whether it is an item which was considered by the House and not adopted.

Mr. HALE. It was presented by the Department since the bill came from the House.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator know why it was that so important a matter was not brought to the attention of the House?

Mr. HALE. If the Senator knew how many matters on all these appropriation bills——

Mr. BACON. I do not know, and I am asking the Senator for that reason.

Mr. HALE. I will say it is rather irksome to Senators in charge of these bills not only how many matters are not submitted to the House, but how many are not submitted to the Senate committee, and we do not get them until after the bills have been reported to the Senate. We have to do the best we can.

Mr. BACON. I can very readily understand how, without the Department being charged with remissness, that can be true in many cases, but I can hardly understand how so important a matter as this, involving so large an expenditure, should have been overlooked by the Department when these matters were presented to the House, or worse still, if it was not presented even to the Senate committee until after the bill had been reported.

This is a very large expenditure. However, I believe it relates to a former appropriation.

Mr. HALE. There is no appropriation made here.

Mr. BACON. And the limit is within the former appropriation?

Mr. HALE. There is no direct appropriation of money.

Mr. BACON. I see; I was in error about that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 35, line 12, before the word "hundred," to strike out "continue one," and insert "complete two;" on page 36, line 3, after the word "dollars," to insert "improvements to water front, $100,000;" and in line 5, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "seven," so as to make the clause read:

Navy-yard, Norfolk, Va.: Railroad tracks, extensions, $15,000; telephone system, extensions, $7,000; electric plant, extensions, $50,000; repairs, buildings, St. Helena, $25,000; central power plant, to complete, $200,000; dredging, to continue, $50,000; railroad rolling stock, $10,000; extension to wharf at dry dock No. 3, $50,000; heating system, extensions, $10,000; compressed-air system, extensions, $10,000; dry kiln for construction and repair, $7,500; renew roof of foundry, building No. 22, steam engineering, $8,000; new roof and crane for building No. 23, steam engineering, $60,000; elevator in buildings Nos. 11, 13, 14, 17, and 33, $20,000; naval supply storehouse (to cost $450,000) $50,000; improvements to building No. 16, complete, $25,000; heating building No. 37, steam engineering, $7,500; improvements to water front, $100,000; in all, navy-yard, Norfolk, Va., $705,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 11, after the word "dollars," to insert, "elevator and interior fittings, building No. 7, $17,000; paving and grading (to continue), $10,000; clearing yard, $5,000;" and in line 15, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "sixty-seven;" so as to make the clause read:

Navy-yard, Charleston, S. C.: Sewer system, extension, $5,000; heating system, extensions, $10,000; completing power plant, $70,000; slips for torpedo boats, $50,000; elevator and interior fittings, building No. 7, $17,000; paving and grading (to continue), $10,000; clearing yard, $5,000; in all, navy-yard, Charleston, S. C., $167,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 24, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred and forty thousand" and insert "two hundred and eighty thousand," so as to read:

Navy-yard, Puget Sound, Washington: Electric-light plant, extensions, $5,000; water system, extensions, $12,000; heating system, extensions, $6,000; stone and concrete dry dock, to continue (to cost $2,000,000), $100,000; sewer system, extensions, $3,000; telephone system, extensions, $3,000; railroad and equipment, extensions, $10,000; central power plant, extensions, $280,000; etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 8, on page 38.

Mr. PILES. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine if he does not think the total on page 38 should be changed? I call attention to the fact that the increase on page 36 of the bill was from $140,000 to $280,000, and that is not carried out in the total on page 38.

Mr. HALE. That will be done before the bill is completed.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 19 on page 38.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine a question about the provision just read. Will the Secretary kindly read the paragraph?

The Secretary read as follows:

Naval station, Olongapo, P. I.: Toward the improvement and development of the naval station, Olongapo, P. I., $100,000. The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to expend, without limitation as to quantities and unit prices, the various amounts appropriated by the act approved April 27, 1904, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes," for the naval station, Olongapo, P. I., for the respective improvements therein named.

Mr. WARREN. I call the Senator's attention to the language of the paragraph read, on page 38. In the first place, while the appropriation here is only $100,000, it is for a naval station at Olongapo, and it also reappropriates the amounts that now stand to the credit of that project and have so stood since 1904 without limitation as to the quantities and unit prices. In other words, whatever limitations were on the original appropriations are here removed. Does the Senator remember what amount of money is involved?

Mr. HALE. I had supposed, until it was investigated by the Department, that it involved something like $1,000,000. But there is only about $100,000.

Mr. WARREN. My idea was that there was about $300,000. Part of it has been expended?

Mr. HALE. It has been expended.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Senator, unless he has some memoranda in his hand which he wishes to read, whether there has been, to the Senator's knowledge, any definite plan decided upon as to a navy-yard at Olongapo?

Mr. HALE. No. I for one and, I think, the committee are against any great expenditure at Olongapo, but investigation showed that this amount was small, and something was needed; a little every year. The committee, I will say, is not prepared to enter upon any large scheme involving the building of a great naval station or base at Olongapo.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will recall his sentiments expressed on another bill with reference to this matter.

Mr. HALE. Yes; the fortifications bill.

Mr. WARREN. And I am asking for this information as a guide to what we may do in conference upon that bill. Of course if we are to have a navy-yard there, even a small one, there should also be some reasonable fortification. I wanted to find out, if I could, how much property we had to protect so far as a navy-yard is concerned. We all understand about it being a haven for shipping.

Mr. PERKINS. We have a dry dock there.

Mr. WARREN. We know that, too. But that is to be removed.

Mr. HALE. I am glad the Senator has called attention to it, because it gives me an opportunity to say that I think the feeling of the committee is against what was the original project of building up a great naval base or navy-yard or whatever you may call it at this place; and this appropriation is agreed to because it is only in accordance with maintaining what we have there and doing some of the customary things that are needed in a small way.

Mr. WARREN. I see there are other small appropriations for Olongapo through the bill. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows of course the feeling of the chairman of the committee on the other side. It is public. He is in favor of very large expenditures at Olongapo. Does the Senator know whether he has changed in that view?

Mr. HALE. I do not know. I know I have not.

Mr. WARREN. I agree entirely with the Senator from Maine. I think we should confine it to a very small expenditure, but I think if we are to spend money there on a navy-yard we must proceed with some fortifications sufficient to fairly protect it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to make an inquiry. It seems rather an unusual statement contained in this provision that money appropriated in 1904 should now be available. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee how it is that money appropriated in 1904 is available for appropriation in the nature of a continuing fund, and why, if I understand the law correctly, it was not returned to the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year two years ago?

Mr. HALE. It can not be expended unless it is in terms by law, as we do here, made available.

Mr. HEYBURN. What kept it out of the Treasury two years ago? Did we continue it then?

Mr. HALE. It is one of the permanent funds that, under the decisions of the Comptroller, does not so absolutely lapse that it may not be revived by the action of Congress. There are several of those.

Mr. HEYBURN. We are reviving it after four years. Under the limitation that we can not make an appropriation for the Army and Navy extending more than two years, it would seem, unless this money was expended under the appropriation of 1904, it would have passed back into the Treasury, and that we would now, if we desired to make it available, be required to appropriate it as an original sum, and that there would be no occasion for referring to the appropriation of four years ago.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I may say, on the point the Senator from Idaho is discussing, that funds are held three years after the end of the fiscal year, so as to provide for contracts or any accounts that may be outstanding; and in so far as that may affect it, it has not been a complete covering back into the Treasury.

Mr. HEYBURN. In a moment I will understand it. This recites, in lines 15 to 17, that it was appropriated——

Mr. HALE. For the year ended June 30, 1905.

Mr. HEYBURN. Nineteen hundred and five. More than the constitutional limitation has elapsed since then. I merely want to get at the fact as a matter of information. I should like to know how it is that money which should have been covered into the Treasury on the 30th day of last June is now available for appropriation, not out of funds in the Treasury, but as a continuance of an existing fund that has been set aside. I inquire more in order to advise myself as to how this can be done. I assume the committee have given it consideration.

Mr. HALE. We have the opinion of the Comptroller.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course it is up to the Comptroller, if I may use the expression——

Mr. HALE. Yes; it is up to the Comptroller.

Mr. HEYBURN. Whether this money is available, and if the money is needed; and if there is any question about this fund being available, we should make it perfectly clear in this bill at the present time. Otherwise we might find that we had attempted to make an appropriation for this purpose of money that was not in existence because it was not appropriated out of the general money in the Treasury.

Mr. WARREN. I think it has been carried along——

Mr. LODGE. I think it has been continued.

Mr. WARREN. Because of the very condition the Senator from Maine has related, that he himself was not in favor of this expenditure until there was further investigation made.

Mr. HEYBURN. I thought that might be the case, and I thought I might get that information. I have not had the time to look at the last appropriation act to see if it has been carried forward.

Mr. WARREN. I think it has been.

Mr. HALE. The Department, in submitting this estimate, states that the appropriation is still alive and can be made available in this way.

Mr. HEYBURN. Did the committee check on the ruling of the Comptroller? Of course Comptrollers change; and that is a mere ruling, while this happens to be a constitutional provision. It may be a matter that should be looked into. I do not know of any power that the Comptroller would have to make a ruling that a fund which had been appropriated more than two years before this time would be available for use at this time except as a direct appropriation from the Treasury. I should have some doubts as to whether the Comptroller would have the power to do that, and I should inquire very carefully into any opinion that the Comptroller has given that a fund the application of which expired June 30, 1905, is available at this time.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call attention to the fact that under the Constitution the two years' limit on appropriations applies only to the Army and not to the Navy. Senators can see by reading the paragraph—

To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

And the next provision is:

To provide and maintain a Navy.

There is no such limitation in regard to the Navy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will be continued.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 39, after line 2, to insert:

Naval station, Pearl Harbor, Hawaii: The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to establish a naval station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on the site heretofore acquired for that purpose; and to erect thereat all the necessary machine shops, storehouses, coal sheds, and other necessary buildings, and to build thereat one graving dry dock capable of receiving the largest war vessels of the Navy, at a cost not to exceed $2,000,000 for said dry dock. The sums hereinafter stated are hereby appropriated and made immediately available, to be expended at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, to wit: Toward dredging an entrance channel of a depth of 35 feet, $400,000; toward construction of dry dock, $300,000; toward erecting machine shops (to cost $300,000), $100,000; storehouses (to cost $300,000), $100,000; toward yard development, $100,000; in all, $1,000,000. That the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, enter into contracts for any portion of the work, including material therefor, within the respective limits of cost herein stipulated, subject to appropriations to be made therefor by Congress, or may direct the construction of said works or any portion thereof under the supervision of a civil engineer of the Navy.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether the House considered this proposition at all?

Mr. HALE. The House considered it and passed a bill for the purpose, and our committee put it on this appropriation bill upon the theory that all of these naval appropriations had better go upon the naval appropriation bill, so that at a glance one can see what the naval expenditures are. Not only did the committee of the House consider it, but the House passed it.

Mr. TELLER. Not on this appropriation bill?

Mr. HALE. No; but in a separate bill.

Mr. TELLER. In a separate bill?

Mr. HALE. And so the committee here put it on the pending bill, instead of passing it separately.

Mr. TELLER. So it is only a question of the bill it shall go on?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The thought was—and I think the Senator will agree with me—that all the expenses in any particular branch of the Government had better be in one place in order that we may know what the aggregate is.

Mr. TELLER. I agree with that, and I feel especially interested in this amendment. As it is a Senate committee amendment, I desired to know whether the House was hostile to it or not. I am glad that it is likely to become a law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 10, to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to transfer from the navy-yard, Boston, Mass., to and erect at the navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H., the 100-ton shears improved and repaired under the acts approved July 1, 1902, and March 3, 1903, and the unexpended balances of the appropriations made by said acts for the improvement of said shears are hereby reappropriated, and the further sum of $2,400 is hereby appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine in regard to the amendment why the shears are to be transferred from the Boston Navy-Yard?

Mr. HALE. I ask that the Secretary may read the communication from the Secretary of the Navy, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 20, 1908.

SIR: The Department desires to bring to the attention of your committee the desirability of having transferred from the navy-yard, Boston, Mass., to the navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H., the 100-ton shears constructed under authority contained in the act of March 2, 1891 (26 Stat. L., 803).

When pier No. 1 was constructed at the navy-yard it was necessary to take down the shears, owing to the fact that they were cut off from the water front by the construction of the pier. It was then found desirable to make certain improvements and repairs, and for this purpose Congress appropriated $20,000 by the acts approved July 1, 1902, and March 3, 1903. Contract was made for the improvement and erection of the shears on pier No. 1, but after the work of improvement was nearly completed and the erection was about to be made, the Department decided that the location was too remote from the working part of the yard, and directed that the shears be not erected at that point, but that an appropriation be asked for erection on pier No. 6. It being necessary to strengthen pier No. 6 before the heavy weights handled by the shears could be borne by it, estimates were submitted under the head of "Public Works, Bureau of Yards and Docks," for the fiscal years 1906, 1907, and 1908, but no appropriation was made by Congress.

An estimate was not submitted for the present bill, owing to the fact that floating derricks have been found more useful than stationary shears, especially at yards where piers are built out at right angles with the water front. However, at the navy-yard, Portsmouth, which has no piers, it is believed that the shears would be very useful, and as they can be transported and erected at that yard for a comparatively small amount the Department is of opinion that it would be an economical expenditure to authorize such transfer.

A draft of a proposed amendment to the naval bill is accordingly submitted for consideration by the committee. The unexpended balances referred to amount to $3,647.80.

Respectfully, V. H. METCALF, Secretary.

Hon. EUGENE HALE, United States Senator,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I understand from that letter that the shears are not now in use at the Boston yard for the reason set forth in the letter, the fact that piers have been built at that yard. I assume, of course, that the yard at Boston is provided with a floating derrick, for it would be very poor economy to leave a yard of that size and importance, where many ships are repaired, without either shears or a derrick. I gather from what the letter says that they can use a floating derrick at Boston owing to the piers, whereas at Portsmouth, where there are no piers, they can use the shears with advantage. If that is the case, of course I have no objection whatever to make to the amendment, but I do not want the Boston yard left without machinery of that character.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 22, to increase the total appropriation for public works, navy-yards, and stations, from $3,170,400 to $4,634,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line 2, page 43.

Mr. HALE. We have now reached another portion of the bill. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] is desirous of going on with a conference report, and I will yield to him.

INVESTIGATION OF PRICE OF WOOD PULP AND PRINT PAPER.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 344.

Whereas it is alleged by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association that the cost of paper to the users thereof is at least $60,000,000 per annum greater at the present time than it was two years ago; and

Whereas it is alleged by others that the cost of news print paper to newspaper publishers, magazine publishers, and printing-house managers will under the price now asked be $65,000,000 greater for the current year than heretofore; and

Whereas it is alleged by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association that the statistics compiled by the Bureau of the Census concerning the cost and price of news print paper are erroneous, inaccurate, incomplete, and valueless as a guide to legislation; and

Whereas it is alleged by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association that the price of print paper has increased from 35 to 50 per cent during the past few months; and

Whereas it is alleged and asserted that the alleged increased price of paper is in part the result of a combination and conspiracy on the part of wood pulp and paper manufacturers and dealers to control, regulate, monopolize, and restrain interstate and foreign commerce and trade in the manufacture and sale of news print, manila, fiber, and other kinds of paper and paper products; and

Whereas it is alleged by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association that the International Paper Company and other paper manufacturers and dealers have threatened to advance and have advanced the price of print paper $22 per ton during the last few months; and

Whereas it is alleged that this great advance in the price of paper is made possible by the duty of $6 per ton on print paper, being the same rate of duty for the last eighteen years, and in the last three tariff laws; and

Whereas it is claimed and asserted that the price of print paper is in no wise affected by the tariff; that the increase in price of recent date has not been excessive, and is not the result either of tariff import duty or of any combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or otherwise, but is the result wholly of the increase in the cost of the raw materials and the increase in the wages paid for labor and the shortening of the hours of labor per day; and

Whereas on May 11, 1906, judgment was entered in the circuit court for the district of Minnesota, dissolving the General Paper Company as a combination in restraint of trade; and

Whereas the increase in the price of paper has occurred notwithstanding the dissolution of the said General Paper Company or paper trust, and the Department of Justice, though appealed to, reports that it has obtained no evidence sufficient to justify the institution of legal proceedings, either civil or criminal, against the alleged combination of wood pulp or print paper manufacturers; and

Whereas it is stated by the Attorney-General of the United States that after complaint had been filed with said Attorney-General against the so-called "paper combination" or "trust" the complainant refused to furnish legal proof or give the names of witnesses having personal knowledge of the facts; and

Whereas it is alleged that the combination of print paper manufacturers in the United States have purchased the output of all the paper mills in Canada in excess of the home consumption, which said purchase, it is alleged, is in furtherance of a conspiracy in restraint of interstate and foreign commerce; and

Whereas it is alleged that the great production of wood pulp in the United States is rapidly depleting the forests of this country, and that legislation ought to be enacted which will permit and encourage the importation of wood pulp upon more favorable terms, so as to conserve our national forests; and

Whereas it is desirable that the House of Representatives shall be fully informed as to all of the facts in the case, and as to whether there does exist or can exist, beyond the reach of the existing power of the Department of Justice and of the courts to prevent, a combination or conspiracy among the manufacturers or dealers or others to so increase the price, to control the character of the paper manufactured, or to regulate the output of wood pulp or the paper mills, in restraint of trade among the several States or with any foreign country, to the end that needful legislation may be enacted: Now, therefore

Resolved, That the Speaker shall appoint a select committee of six Members to investigate and inquire into the said alleged facts and to obtain all possible information in regard to the same, and to inquire into the elements and conditions involved in the production and supply of wood pulp and print paper in so far as the same are or may be affected by any combination or conspiracy to control, regulate, monopolize, or restrain interstate or foreign commerce and trade in the manufacture, supply, distribution, or sale of wood pulp or paper of any kind, or any of the articles entering into the same, or any of the products of paper, and in so far as the same may be affected by the import duties upon wood pulp or paper of any kind, and in so far as the same may be affected by the rapid destruction of the forests in the United States and the consequent increase in the price of wood which enters into the manufacture of wood pulp, and also to inquire whether the present prices of print and other paper are controlled in whole or in part by any combination of persons or corporations engaged in commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, and, if so, to inquire into the organization, conduct, methods, and practices of such corporations or persons.

Said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall be authorized to sit in Washington or elsewhere during the sessions of the House and during the recess of Congress, and shall have power to subpœna and examine witnesses under oath, and to send for records, papers, and all other evidence that may be necessary to make the investigation and inquiry herein directed to be made full and complete, and that the Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpœnas during the recess of Congress.

Mr. DALZELL. I ask for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to inquire what was the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER. He moved the previous question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On what?

The SPEAKER. On the resolution. The Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. The time to raise the question, even if it were not privileged, has gone by, but the Chair will say it is section 61 of Rule XI.

INVESTIGATION OF PRICE OF WOOD PULP AND PRINT PAPER.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is patent on its face, and does not require lengthy explanation at my hands. It is a matter of public notoriety that there has been a large increase in the price of paper. I suppose there is no gentleman in this House who has ever known in his experience such an agitation as has been aroused by the newspapers of this country within the last three or four weeks. I suppose there is no gentleman who has had so many telegrams and letters upon any particular subject as he has upon the necessity for legislation with respect to the price of paper.

Now, while there is a consensus of opinion as to the increase in the price, there is no consensus of opinion as to the cause of that increase. It is contended by some, and notably by our friends upon the other side of the middle aisle, that this increase is due to the tariff—a tariff of 15 per cent—the lowest that has been on paper since the tariff laws were enacted. I think, personally, that it is capable of mathematical demonstration that the increase in the price of paper is not due to the tariff, and would not be changed by a removal of it. However that may be, there are others who contend that it is due to a combination, to a trust, while the Attorney-General reports to this House in answer to a resolution sent to him, that he has been unable to find any evidence that would justify him in prosecuting parties alleged to be in combination. On the other hand, still again, it is contended by the manufacturers of paper that the increase of price is perfectly legitimate, that it is due to an increase in the cost of the raw materials and an increase in the cost of labor. Now, under these circumstances if there be necessity for legislation, and it is contended that there is such necessity, how shall we legislate unless the House have the necessary information upon which to base a bill?

It is not the custom of the House of Representatives to legislate with respect to any of the great interests of this country without in the first place affording them a hearing. Is this increase in the price of paper due to the tariff, and will it be relieved by a removal of the tariff? Is it due to a combination and will it be relieved by the prosecution of that combination, or is it a legitimate increase in the price of paper due to an increase in the cost of raw materials and in labor? How shall we answer these questions without calling before us parties in possession of the information and of the expert knowledge necessary to be had in order to give an intelligent answer? It is for the purpose of getting that information that this resolution proposes the creation by the Speaker of a committee of six Members of this House, armed with all the authority of the House, to call for persons and papers, administer oaths, and arrive at a true solution of the problem, so as to legislate wisely, intelligently, and in the interest of all the people.

I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the rise in the price of paper is due both to the tariff and to a combination, and the combination is due to the tariff. If we were anxious, Mr. Speaker, to kill the combination, it could be done in very short order by recognizing somebody upon that side of the Chamber to move under suspension of the rules to discharge the Ways and Means Committee from further consideration of the Stevens bill, or some other bill, to put wood pulp and print paper upon the free list, and pass the bill. Then if there be a combination you would have killed it, and if there be no combination you would not have done any harm.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes of the time on this side to my colleague upon the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] yields ten minutes to his colleague from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] and reserves the remainder of his time.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, there has been widespread contention throughout this country for a considerable length of time over the question of the duty upon wood pulp and print paper, and over the result of the combination of those who control in this country the supply of print paper. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, Members of the House have been deluged with letters and telegrams asking for some measure of relief from this paper trust extortion. The relief that is to be given is to be found in this resolution, preceded by its fourteen "whereases." Of course I have not gone into the history or made an examination of resolutions; but I should venture to say—and I think I may do it without much risk—that perhaps no resolution upon any important subject ever before was offered to the House with so many apologies for it as are offered in whereases for this resolution. [Applause.] How much briefer the preamble might be: "Whereas it is deemed by the Republican leaders of this House expedient, in the interest of the Republican party, to delude the people again, if possible: Therefore, Resolved," and so forth. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

No question is made that the increase in the price of paper has been enormous of late years. There is not in these numerous whereases a denial that the increase has been brought about, at least in part, by a combination, nor will any man pretend to say there is ground for a denial that the duty upon wood pulp and print paper contributes to the extortion.

I have not the time, and it would be needless if I had, to talk about how the tariff often breeds trusts, because I think everybody who chooses to understand does understand that one of the prime purposes of imposing a tariff duty, when that tariff duty is unnecessary and is wholly for what is called "protection," is to facilitate the formation of combinations and the perfecting of monopoly. Certainly the price of print paper and wood pulp has been enormously increased. That has been conceded; no one denies it. To remove the duty would at least lessen the extortion and lower the price. Why, then, not remove the duty? How far that would go toward breaking a combination is a matter that can be determined by nothing less than legislation looking to a breaking up of the combination. This resolution is nothing more, nothing less, than a contrivance that is to be put to work to delude the people and make them believe that there is an attempt to do something, when the direct attempt is to do nothing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It will be noted that the committee is to be made up of six members. Ordinarily committees are of odd numbers. This committee will be made up of four Republicans and two Democrats. It will have four Republicans, who will report what the party leaders wish reported; two Democrats will be put on the committee as a mere matter of grace.

Now, if we are to have a real investigation, why not have a committee fairly divided between the parties? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why not have a committee that would investigate? Why not have a committee that is not stocked at the start? Why not have a committee for the purpose of investigating? These frauds have succeeded very often. These devices have been successful more than once, successful through many campaigns and for many years. Perhaps they will be again. If they are, the fault will be with the people, and it will be a demonstration of the truth of what Barnum, the great showman, said long ago, that "the people love to be humbugged." If they can be humbugged by this resolution, it must be from a pure love of a humbug and of being its victims. Fourteen whereases and a long resolution instead of some decent, practical legislation for which the country cries and pleads!

What will the press do about it? What will the press say about it? I do not know. If the gentlemen who publish newspapers are willing to suffer two years, or ten years, longer, and take this as a salve or a solace, let them have it. If on the contrary, they are tired of being the victims, robbed by the law, will they make themselves felt?

This performance deserves to be denounced by the American people. It deserves to be stigmatized as the pretense that it is. Why not bring up the wood-pulp bill and kill it? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why strangle it in committee? Why make a pretense of doing something as an excuse for doing nothing, an excuse worse than the offense; first denying justice, and then following the offense by combining injury and insult?

The injury is bad enough, everybody knows. The insult is wanton, inexcusable, and deserves the severest condemnation that can be visited upon it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, there is the situation; with rules which enable you to put any question to a vote at any time, you will not permit a vote upon the wood-pulp and paper tariff duty. You want more information.

Sixty million dollars of increase in two years; $65,000,000 increase threatened in the coming year in the price of paper, and yet nothing done, because you have not information enough, and you must get the information by the aid of four partisan Republicans and two Democrats as your committee! Whoever believes that is relief, or that it promises relief, or that it has in it anything except the absolute denial of relief, attended with insult, certainly must be very gullible, very easily gulled. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If it be so easy to delude the American people, you ought to be able to succeed in this effort at deception. If it be demonstrated that you can succeed in this, then pretense and sham and hypocrisy will go, instead of justice and decent treatment and sincerity. Then indirection is better than direction; then wrong is better than right; then insult is better than respectful consideration; then robbery is better than justice; then combination and monopoly are preferable to fair play and the square deal. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding, I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether there will be more than one speech on that side.

Mr. DALZELL. We shall conclude in one speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the situation with which we are confronted is this: A political criminal, a prisoner to public opinion, threatened with the halter, is moving for a continuance. That is the situation just now. The object of this resolution is to appoint a partisan House committee to bring in a partisan report, to whitewash the tariff as a criminal against the American people with regard to wood pulp. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The next object of this resolution is to delay action and to circumvent this man, Herman Ridder, at the head of this great association of publishers—this "old German devil," as some people are beginning to call him at this time. This resolution is an excuse not to act upon the Küstermann bill, not to act upon the Stevens bill or the Williams bill or the Clark bill, or any of the half dozen or more bills pending before the Committee on Ways and Means, some of which have been pending for years.

Your party, Mr. Speaker, has had, all told, $750,000 wherewith to investigate and prosecute the violators of the antitrust laws of this country, and yet you pray for this resolution to-day for the purpose of having a partisan House committee, composed in a very remarkable way, of an even number of men—six members, four Republicans and two Democrats—to do the work that with $750,000, by your confession as Speaker of this House and proponent of this resolution, the Republican Executive has not done.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to take stock just for one moment. I do not oppose any investigation. I shall oppose this resolution, however, because I do not believe it will result in any real investigation. If I thought there were to be any real search for the truth, or any real finding and report of the truth, I would be more than willing to vote for it. I voted for the previous resolution introduced by the Speaker, to demand of the Commerce and Labor Department and of the Department of Justice officials, with no personal, political interest directly at stake, information as to what they had done. Taking stock upon this side of the Chamber, gentlemen, our Republican friends tell us over there that we have been indulging in puerile and foolish "filibustering;" that we have been trying to do that which we knew we could not do; that we had no influence upon them; that they would never move until they got ready. Our prodding, they told us, would have no effect, and yet our prodding seems to have had the effect of getting out of the Republican Speaker of this House at least two resolutions. Whether he wants to put wood pulp and print paper on the free list or not, he does at least want an excuse for not doing it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have got him along that far. What else have we done? Why, I am glad to announce that our prodding has resulted this morning in securing out of the Committee on the Election of President and Vice-President and Representatives in Congress, a report in favor of a campaign contribution publicity bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Who is foolish enough to believe that the McCALL bill ever would have come out of that committee, but for our focusing attention on it. I am glad to tell you that our prodding has succeeded in getting a report from a committee of a Republican Senate, now lying on the desk in the Senate, in favor of a modification of the abuse of the right of injunction, whereby State laws are set aside upon an ex parte hearing before one judge, and a recommendation instead that hereafter they shall not be set aside by injunction without at least five days' notice, and without at least three judges sitting en banc upon the question. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let us have now, as soon as possible, consideration by the two Houses of Congress, of these two favorably reported bills. Let somebody be recognized to put them through under suspension.

I think before we get through we will get a model child-labor law for the District of Columbia from the Republican party. I am afraid we never can get a free wood pulp and print paper bill, no matter how great the demand; not because we could not prod Republicans into a support of that by itself, but because every robber-tariff baron in this country is alarmed when another robber-tariff baron is shaken in his castle, and those who would be willing to see wood pulp and print paper put on the free list are afraid "evenhanded justice might later on recommend the poisoned chalice to their own lips" and their particular robbery be put on the free list in revenge by fellow-robbers resenting their desertion.

You Republicans are at last at least aroused on the wood pulp question, are you not? You are not laughing at it like you were in the beginning of the session. You are not ridiculing it out of court as you started in to do, but you have at last become serious about it. The Executive calls upon you to act, and you call upon the Executive to act, and when the Executive will not act, and you will not act, you at least want to present to the country something, with a serious countenance about it at any rate, in the shape of a bill as an excuse or a pretext for not having acted. You have shown at least that you dare not go before the country without a pretext or excuse at any rate, and this resolution is the pretext or excuse; and, as I believe, it is proposed to be enacted for no purpose except to whitewash the effect of the tariff upon this product's price, and that it will result in nothing but delay, and that delay and water-muddying is what it is intended for. I shall for one vote against it, believing that.

Mr. Speaker, this committee to be organized under this resolution would merely provide campaign thunder by a vote of four to two, for the Republican party in the next election. You say, "Investigate and report the facts." Aye, but the investigation depends much upon who is summoned to appear before the committee in order to testify as to the facts, and already—

> The Assyrian has moved down like a wolf on the fold,
> His cohorts all gleaming with purple and gold.

I understand that a large delegation of various combinations, controlling the paper-manufacturing and wood-pulp business in this country, is to move down upon Washington to-day or to-morrow, or very soon, at any rate. Where are you going to get the witnesses which the committee of four to two, which the four are to summon before the committee? From these men who are now moving down upon Washington? Whoever heard one of them testify that his particular little robbery was due to the tariff? Why, if you swung him up by the neck or subjected him to mediæval torture and tried to get him to tell the truth about that matter, you could not get him to do it. I tell you there is a Masonic bond which binds together the men who receive benefits at the expense of the consumer out of the protective protectionism that would prevent any of them from ever "squealing" on himself or his pals, no matter what the torture was. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I believe if I had the leaders of the Republican party who are not receiving personal benefit from the tariff here upon the stand and could torture out of them what their real motive in connection with the resolution was, I think even they would say that, "It was to circumvent that old devil, Herman Ridder," and the association of which he is president; in a word, to avoid and to get around legislation on this question.

Mr. Speaker, there is no use in that; all you have to do under the special rules under which we are operating is to recognize somebody, not me, not the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]—we are Democrats, and "no good can come out of Nazareth," we know that—but to recognize the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], to recognize the gentleman into whose face I am looking [Mr. KÜSTERMANN], to recognize somebody over there on your own side to move to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from further consideration of H. R. blank—whatever the number is—and put it on its passage under suspension of the rules. It comes right back after all, Mr. Speaker, to you and your power of recognition, which is discretionary, arbitrary, and unrestricted, and nothing can evade nor shall be allowed to evade your responsibility. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think I will not occupy the full time that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has kindly granted me. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has catalogued various measures which he claims his party has compelled the House, and even the Senate, to pass by reason of this foolish filibuster which they have carried on for the past two or three weeks. Yet, Mr. Speaker, every measure which the gentleman has named was pending in one House or the other before the Democracy, under the lead of my genial friend from Mississippi, undertook their horseplay which they have been carrying on for some time—every one of them. [Applause on the Republican side.] The country knows, if our Democratic friends across the aisle do not know, that the action taken by the Republican majority in this House and in the other was not affected in the least by the foolish and unwarranted procedure of the past two or three weeks in this House. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] asserts that the resolution now pending is a prospective procedure to protect the political criminal. I had supposed that no one in the House would more vehemently assert the wisdom of the rule that no one should be considered guilty until so proven, that all people should be considered in the eyes of the law innocent until proven guilty, and I ask the gentleman from Mississippi where has there been an indictment, where has there been a trial, where has there been an investigation to warrant the conclusion that there are criminals, or that this resolution is attempting to reach criminals?

The resolution itself recites that after an investigation no infraction of the law has yet been discovered. The resolution upon its face so recites. And so it is fair to assume, until guilt is proven, that there is innocence. Ah, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] asks in reference to the trusts and the prosecution of the trusts. Why, the gentleman knows that a Republican Congress appropriated hundreds of thousands of dollars for the purpose of carrying on prosecutions under the Sherman antitrust law—prosecutions to be carried on by Republican officials, which have been carried on by Republican officials——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Is it not a fact that the money providing for the prosecutions of the violators of the antitrust law the gentleman speaks of was begun because of an amendment offered by myself to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill of 1903, by which $500,000 was for the first time appropriated, with instructions to the Attorney-General to proceed to prosecute all such violators of that law?

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I congratulate the gentleman upon another wise act on his part, if he has correctly stated it, and I will bear testimony that the gentleman never intentionally makes a misstatement. But a Republican House passed the appropriation for these prosecutions, and if any gentleman in this House believes that those prosecutions have not been vigorously and honestly and earnestly carried on, let him ask some of the gentlemen connected with the trusts that have been subjected to the decisions of the courts.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why did not the Department of Justice have the paper trust that it had enjoined in Minnesota also indicted?

Mr. SHERMAN. The resolution here presented states why the prosecution of the paper trust, so-called "paper trust," was not made—that the persons making the allegations refused to present the names of people to be summoned to prove the allegations.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why did not the Department take the evidence that it enjoined on and turn it over to the grand jury in Minnesota and have the grand jury make an investigation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Whether it did or did not I do not know. Probably they did everything that the gentleman is speaking of. I am not advised as to that.

Mr. Speaker, the Republican party does not assume that any man is guilty until he has been given a chance to be heard. It does not assume guilt until guilt is proven. Nor does the Republican party attempt to legislate in reference to the tariff or any other subject without the fullest possible investigation thereon. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], scholarly, thoughtful, and an adept in the use of English hardly without an equal on this floor, indulges this morning in the use of some adjectives. He speaks of the proposed action here as an injury and as an insult. Mr. Speaker, those are mild words compared with the words used by a Democratic President in describing the last act of the Democratic party in reference to a tariff bill. Does my friend from Missouri forget that the Wilson law was described by a Democratic President, who declined to add his signature to the bill, making it a law, and held Congress in session for two or three weeks until the time had passed so that the bill became a law without his signature—does my Missouri friend forget that a Democratic President described that act as one of idiocy and infamy, of perfidy, and of dishonor? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SHERMAN. I decline to yield again. The Republican party proposes, when it does take up the tariff question, when it does enact legislation in reference to economic questions, to do so advisedly, considerately, with the fullest possible knowledge, and no Republican President yet has failed to sign a tariff bill sent by a Republican House for his consideration. [Applause on the Republican side.] And I predict, Mr. Speaker, that when a Republican President does have a tariff bill to consider, sent to him by a Republican House, it will be a measure so well digested, a measure framed after the fullest possible thought, the fullest possible knowledge obtained by all interested parties on every subject, that that measure instead of being described by a Republican President as one of perfidy and dishonor will receive his prompt and unqualified approval—not merely in words, but in action, and I predict that a Republican President, when a Republican Congress does send him a tariff bill, will approve it promptly and fully in every particular, because the bill will be framed, as I say, with an eye single to American interests, not South not North, not East, not West; it will be a measure which is framed with an eye not to the laboring man alone, but it will be a measure framed with a thought to care for labor and capital alike, for the North and South alike, for the consumer and the producer alike, for every class and every station of our country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

That, Mr. Speaker, is why we are insisting that this resolution in reference to a certain industry shall be now passed, so that we may have the fullest possible information before any legislation is enacted in reference to this subject. My friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] says that the price of paper has increased within the past few years. Of course it has. Has not the price of cotton also increased, Mr. Speaker? Has the tariff affected that? Why, the mere fact, Mr. Speaker, that the price of cotton has increased can not be taken as an indictment of the tariff. It is perfectly absurd to draw any such conclusion. A word more and that is all, Mr. Speaker. The Republican majority in this House proposes to continue as it began in bringing in under the rules which it provides propositions to obtain all the information that is obtainable on every subject before bringing for the consideration of the House on final passage any measure, and that is the purpose of this rule, Mr. Speaker, and this Republican House takes full responsibility for the resolution and will pass it and uphold the Speaker in this House in choosing, as he has chosen heretofore and as he will choose in this instance, a committee that the country will accept as high minded, honorable, fair, and with the determination to reach the bottom facts and give them unprejudiced and unbiased fully to the House for its consideration and action. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know what we are voting on. Are we voting on the entire resolution and preamble or just on the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The previous question is called for on the resolution and preamble, or was it on the preamble only?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I just made the general motion. I confess I did not have this matter in mind at the time at all.

The SPEAKER. Then the previous question operates upon the resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the reason I asked that is the question of voting for the preamble commits the House to all that is set forth in the preamble, which is a mere recital of facts, because it does not carry any legislative authority.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to submit to the Chair the question of whether or not, in the opinion of the Chair, the resolution does not contain more than one independent substantive proposition.

Mr. DALZELL. The resolution provides for the appointment of a committee, that is all, and defines its powers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It provides for the appointment of a committee, armed with power to do three several things.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution and preamble.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the previous question having been ordered, under the rules it is not in order to suspend the rules and pass the resolution. I call the attention of the Chair to a decision on that point in the Digest. On page 720 of the Digest it says:

It is not in order to move to suspend the rules while the previous question is operating.

Mr. DALZELL. I will call the attention of the Chair to the next paragraph after the one read by the gentleman:

A motion to suspend the rules may be entertained, although a measure on which the previous question has been ordered may be pending.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but if the gentleman will examine that decision I think he will find that the motion to suspend the rules was to suspend the rules and pass another resolution than the one upon which the previous question had been ordered.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, I do not know what the facts were in connection with the previous ruling——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The previous question having been ordered, a vote must be taken directly upon the main question. That is the object of ordering the previous question.

Mr. DALZELL. Why, my motion is to suspend all rules.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but it is not in order under your rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs the following ruling of Mr. Speaker Crisp to be read:

A motion to suspend the rules may be entertained, although a bill on which the previous question has been ordered may be pending.

On August 1, 1892, Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, moved to suspend the rules and pass a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 159) to continue the provisions of existing laws providing temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. ALBERT J. HOPKINS, of Illinois, made the point of order that the motion of Mr. Holman was not in order, and that the business first in order was the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7520) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes, upon which the previous question had been ordered, which amendments were pending when the House adjourned on Saturday last.

The Speaker overruled the point of order, holding that this being the first Monday of the month, it was in order to entertain motions to suspend the rules, that the object of such motion was to suspend all rules, and the effect was to bring the House to an immediate vote on the pending motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the ruling of Mr. Speaker Crisp.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The ruling is not in point. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the motion to suspend the rules was upon a question upon which the previous question had not been ordered.

The SPEAKER. On the contrary——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the Chair's pardon.

The SPEAKER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the Chair's pardon. It was a separate and distinct resolution. The numbers of the resolution and bill show that.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules may be entertained, although the bill on which the previous question has been ordered may be pending.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was another bill.

Mr. DALZELL. The fundamental fact is that we moved to suspend all the rules.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The previous question had been ordered upon H. R. 7520 and Senate amendments, and while the previous question had been ordered a motion was made to suspend the rules and to pass House resolution 159—an entirely different resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Really a question of consideration involved.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The precedent to which I call the attention of the Chair, and which I ask the Chair to examine, was a case where the previous question having been ordered, the attempt was made, as I recall, to do just what the gentleman is attempting to do now—to prevent the action of the House upon a question upon which the House has decided to act at once.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the logic of the decision rendered by Speaker Crisp and the logic of the situation is to suspend all rules.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The House has just decided to vote at once upon the pending question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule. The previous question was ordered on agreeing to the resolution. This motion to suspend the rules covers both the preamble and the resolution. Therefore the Chair again refers to Mr. Speaker Crisp's ruling, as follows:

The Speaker overruled the point of order, holding that this being the first Monday of the month it was in order to entertain motions to suspend the rules; that the object of such motion was to suspend all the rules, and the effect was to bring the House to an immediate vote on the pending motion.

The Chair believes that that ruling of Mr. Speaker Crisp was correct, and this motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to suspend all rules and pass not only the resolution but the preamble as well, upon which preamble the previous question has not been ordered. And in principle it comes within the ruling of Mr. Speaker Crisp. It is a proceeding to dispense with all rules of every nature and pass the bill. The Chair overrules the point of order. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Would it be in order now, after this motion, to ask a separate vote upon the four separate propositions involved?

The SPEAKER. If the rules are suspended on the resolution and the preamble—the previous question pending upon the resolution, but not pending upon the preamble—if this motion should be agreed to, it disposes of the whole matter in one vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought as much, and that is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be recognized on the motion to suspend the rules. I demand a second.

Mr. DALZELL. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair orders a second under the rules. [Applause on the Republican side.] Is the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] opposed to this resolution?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am, undoubtedly; oh, undoubtedly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] to twenty minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say, first, that I have not criticised the ruling of the Chair, because, under the circumstances as developed, I believe that this particular ruling is correct. I am opposed to this resolution, however, Mr. Speaker, and I shall vote against it. I am opposed to this resolution because it is such a farce. [Laughter.] Look at the situation. There has been a great contention that those who use print paper have been suffering as the result of the injustices of Republican legislation. The pressure was getting pretty hot on the Speaker, and so he first thought he would put the Administration in a hole and let himself out. [Laughter.] The Attorney-General has had $750,000 for the last four or five years to enforce the antitrust laws. The Speaker introduced a resolution, which passed this House, calling upon the Attorney-General to let him know just what had been done. The Attorney-General made a reply which satisfied him, pleased the "Big Stick" up in the White House, but was not particularly pleasing to the "Big Gun" in the House of Representatives. Then the Speaker said, "Why, they have me again." So he fixed up a resolution, which recites a great many things in the "whereases." Then he provides that the Speaker shall appoint a committee of six to investigate the matter.

Why have a committee waste the time of its members in this investigation when the Speaker has outlined the whole programme? He knows what he is going to permit the House to do. Why not direct the Speaker to investigate and ascertain what the facts are? And after he has done that, under the direction of the House, why not permit him to frame another resolution and then call the Committee on Rules together and tell them what he wants done, bring in a report, tell those on that side of the House that he wants it adopted, and then do it? Why go through the farce of having a committee of six lose their vacation to keep back a report until after the election, and then drop the whole business?

Mr. Speaker, I am not an expert on wood pulp and print paper myself, but I have been in communication with some men who imagine that they are. I have told them it was useless to write to me about this matter, that the Speaker has abrogated all the rules of the House; he is the whole business here now. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] He can recognize anybody he pleases to move to suspend the rules, automatically a second is ordered, and the Chair having decided that a majority is in favor of the motion to suspend the rules, then we are allowed the privilege of recording ourselves and disclosing the fact that no mistake was made when it was arranged that it would be considered that a majority had already voted for the measure.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not yield just now. I said to these men: "You go after the Speaker; he is the only man standing between you and relief. Do not waste time on this side of the House." [Laughter.] It has been demonstrated within the last few days that the White House has lost some influence in this House. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] "We will stand by the President to the last ditch" [renewed laughter], and I expect that "we, with the President," not the President and this side of the House, but "we, with the President," will go together into the last ditch, run over by the Republican majority.

Mr. BATES. Now, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. BATES. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is perfectly sincere in saying that he is opposed to this committee to investigate this subject?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am, and I am going to vote that way.

Mr. BATES. At the same time he admits that he is not an expert in the wood-pulp subject. Does the gentleman think that any of the Members of this House are experts on that subject?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know this, that when the Republican Speaker of this House resorts to unusual methods for the purpose of giving an excuse for not having legislation enacted there must be the most urgent reasons why it should pass. Why, there are a number of questions that neither the gentleman from Pennsylvania, nor the Speaker, nor the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], nor myself, know anything about. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] That is very sweeping, I know.

Mr. BATES. Why not call in experts to inform the gentleman on these very subjects on which he admits he is now in the dark?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have been given all necessary information, and the Speaker has been advised, and the Speaker knows that unless he can have some pretense for not permitting this bill to come before the House, by saying there is an investigation, that he would not, strong as he is, and great as is his nerve, be able to withstand the pressure that comes from all sides for this remedial legislation to remove the duty from wood pulp and print paper.

We know what the trouble is. The Republicans are afraid that if the bars are taken down from one of these schedules before the campaign, you will be unable to make a proper answer to the people of the country for not giving the relief from the extortions of the Dingley Act in a thousand different directions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to an inquiry.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can the gentleman inform the House or the country why the Department of Justice did not submit the evidence on which it got the injunction against the paper trust in Minnesota to the grand jury, under a charge of the court, and turn over to that tribunal the getting of the evidence?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know; but now that the gentleman has called it to the attention of the Speaker, I have not the slightest doubt that the Speaker will introduce a resolution calling upon the Attorney-General to answer the question just propounded by the gentleman from Tennessee. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] Why not?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it not within the power of the House to pass a resolution directing the Department of Justice, or directing the Federal judge to instruct that grand jury to proceed to investigate the paper trust?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is not within the province of the House—of course not. Why, the gentleman can not have been awake to what has been going on here.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I beg your pardon. I will say, Is it not within the province of the Speaker?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is within the province of the Speaker; the Speaker, not the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I confess publicly my error, and I stand corrected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why, Mr. Speaker, this is very delightful weather. Since we have got into this condition where the Speaker pulls the trigger and the "Cannon" booms and the shot is fired, why not pass a resolution that hereafter the Speaker shall constitute a quorum of the House, that he shall sit when he pleases, that he shall remain in session as long as he desires, that he shall consider, vote for, and pass what he believes, not what would be good for the country, but what would be desirable from the standpoint of the Republican party in the next campaign? We can then go out and gambol on the green sward and enjoy life and let the Speaker assume and enjoy the full responsibility for doing the business for which we have been sent here.

What a farce to appoint a committee of six to investigate this trust. If the Attorney-General, with $750,000 at his disposal during the past five or six years has not been able to get the information, does anybody imagine that the Speaker's committee of six can get it? I am surprised that the number of this committee is not five instead of six. Five is a more significant word on that side of the House. Instead of having six, why not have "a block of five" Members to investigate and ascertain whether the Speaker will pass a bill giving some relief to those who are now suffering from the oppressions of the trusts?

Mr. Speaker, have I any time left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to yield ten minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to interrogate him?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. I would ask the Speaker as to what difference there is between his position now and the position that I occupied in 1877 and 1878 in regard to the tin-plate industry, which since that time has become one of the greatest industries in the United States?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Since the gentleman has asked the Speaker that question, I am willing to yield two minutes to the Speaker to answer it. [Laughter.] If the Speaker does not desire to take the time, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I note that the first of the whereases in this resolution reads as follows:

That it is alleged by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association that the cost of paper to the users thereof is at least $60,000,000 per annum greater at the present time than it was two years ago.

One of the things that the resolution is to inquire into is the truth or falsity of the points suggested by that "whereas." It is therefore germane to the question to show that that inquiry is totally unnecessary and is already answered by statistics.

One of the Congressmen on the floor not long ago in writing to one of his constituents said that this statement was exaggerated and that the man making it should have been more careful, and he recites that the statement that he said was exaggerated was the statement which is alluded to in the preamble, and that is that these illegal combinations have imposed a burden upon consumers of all kinds of paper, and if carried out as indicated by the public utterances of leaders of various groups, will add at least $60,000,000 per annum to the cost of paper as compared with two years ago.

Let us see what the situation is now as to the facts when compared with that, and, Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a paper establishing these facts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Let us see what is the situation: According to the latest reports the present daily output of paper in the United States is as follows:

	Tons per day.
News	3,600
Book	1,900
Boards	3,300
Wrapping (manila, fiber, and straw)	2,850
Writing	1,400
Roofing and sheathing	610
Tissue	290
Hanging	275
Blotting	60
Total per day	14,285

Equaling 4,546,920 tons per annum.

The news print paper combination raised its price in September, 1907, to $50 per ton in New York, and correspondingly elsewhere, a figure that was $12 per ton in advance of the price of two years previous. The paper makers in that combination refused to make contracts to supply newspapers for more than one year, declaring at the time that the price was going up to $60 per ton in 1908, thereby planning an advance of $22 per ton over the price of two years ago.

The total output of news-print paper per annum is approximately 1,123,000 tons. An average increase of $22 per ton on that quantity would equal	$24,710,400.00
The box-board combination, a secret organization which collapsed on April 1, 1908, admitted that it had raised the price $10 per ton by the force of combination. Its output is approximately 1,029,600 tons, or a total addition for box boards of	10,296,000.00
The wrapping (manila) association marked up its price at eight meetings in New York $12 per ton. Its total output is 889,200 tons per annum, or a total addition of	10,670,400.00
The book-paper combination, in addition to adopting the "trade customs" for marking up revenues and reducing discounts, had advanced its quotation $12 per ton on an output of approximately 5,902,800 tons, equaling	7,113,600.00
The writing-paper combination has followed the example of the book paper combination in formulating "trade customs" and added $12 per ton to its price on an output of approximately 436,800 tons, equaling	5,241,600.00
The blotting-paper makers added $10 per ton to the price on an approximate output of 18,720 tons, equaling	187,200.00
The tissue-paper makers, producing approximately 90,480 tons per annum, added $10 per ton to their price, equaling	904,800.00
The roofing and sheathing combination, with an approximate output of 190,320 tons, advanced its price $10 per ton, equaling	1,903,200.00
Hanging paper, with an approximate output of 82,500 tons per annum, advanced the price $7 per ton, or	577,500.00
Total	61,604,700.00

Here is a total addition planned of sixty-one millions. Where, then, is the exaggeration in charging that the group of paper makers represented in the American Paper and Pulp Association was planning to add $60,000,000 per annum to the cost of paper as compared with two years ago?

Yours, faithfully,

HERMAN RIDDER,
President American Newspaper Publishers' Association.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I find that the seventh "whereas" of the preamble reads as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that this great advance in the price of paper is made possible by the duty of $6 per ton on print paper—

And so forth.

And I find that the eighth "whereas" reads as follows:

Whereas it is claimed and asserted that the price of print paper is in nowise affected by the tariff; that the increase in the price of recent date has not been excessive, and is not the result either of tariff import duty or of any combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or otherwise—

And so forth.

As pertinent and germane to that statement in the preamble of the resolution, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read the following demonstration of the fact that the increase in price is due to the duty, and that the duty did affect the rise in the price.

The Clerk read as follows:

A TAX ON INTELLIGENCE.

Of the three potent agencies for the advancement of general education and culture among a civilized people, the press, the pulpit, and the stage, the first named has in this country by far surpassed in extent and influence the two others. The reasons therefor need not here be discussed; it suffices to lay stress upon the fact that the voice of the press is reaching larger audiences and is appealing to far greater communities than any other public exhorter or instructor. And yet, while others are left unimpeded in the pursuit of their professional work, the renowned free press in this free country of ours is having thrown in the path of its material development obstacles in the shape of detrimental legislation by the National Government. Upon one of the indispensable and most expensive materials used in the composition of a newspaper, print paper, an import duty is being levied which is iniquitous and oppressive, while at the same time the cost of the domestic manufacture of paper is greatly increased through the operation of the duty on wood pulp.

Is there any necessity for these taxes? Can they be reasonably justified? They are simply a present the American paper makers have by lamentations, pretenses, and other means less fair than foul obtained from the Government.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, has all of the time of the other side expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will pardon me, I want to ask the Clerk to mark the place in the article where he stopped reading.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] seems to take as gospel truth the statements of Herman Ridder; and yet of all the men who have submitted statistics to Congress I know of no one who makes more mistakes than this same Herman Ridder. The first time I ever saw the gentleman was perhaps a month ago, when he commenced a conversation by saying that he wanted to get rid of the tariff of 30 per cent on print paper. "Why," I said to him, "Mr. Ridder, you had better get right on the start; the tariff is not 30 per cent on print paper." "Oh, yes, it is." "No; you are mistaken. It is only 15. If you do not know any more about the rest of it than you do about that, it is not much use to talk about it." "Why," said he, "we have to pay $6 a ton on paper that costs $40 a ton, and that is 30 per cent." I handed him a pencil, gave him a piece of paper, and I said to him, "Mr. Ridder, divide $6 by 40 and see what is the result." He figured it over, stopped, and then he said he guessed he would figure it again. He figured it again. "Well," he said, "it does seem to come out that way." I said, "If you do not think that 15 per cent is right, multiply $40 by 15 and see if you don't get $6." He acknowledged that it did come out that way. I asked him never again to make that statement when he was talking about the duty on print paper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Not now. He presented this paper to the Attorney-General, of which he sent me a copy about March 4, in which he asserted that there was a trust or combination among the paper makers to put up the price of print paper, and in that he made certain allegations. It was a long document of three or four pages, and he made the statement as to the increase of the price not only of print paper but of writing paper, manila paper, and various kinds of paper that he said is a result of a combination among the paper makers, and said he could prove his allegations. It seems that the Attorney-General has tried to find from him some person who knows the facts, and not some gentleman who states his information or belief. Among those statements he spoke of the efforts of the combine to put an additional burden of $60,000,000 upon the printing and publishing interests of the country. He sent this statement broadcast, and one newspaper man in Chicago took it up and jumped at the conclusion, as many others did and well might do, that Mr. Ridder meant that $60,000,000 had been added to the price of print paper for newspapers throughout the United States, when in fact they do not pay, all told, $60,000,000 in any one year for print paper.

He wrote to some gentlemen, who denied the fact. Then Mr. Ridder came out with this circular letter of April 14, which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] put into the RECORD, and he sent me a copy of it. I took it and from curiosity I compared it with his first statement that he made to the Attorney-General, and I compared it with the official census made in 1905, and made a liberal calculation for the increase in paper used in 1907. I have not those figures now with me, they are at my home, but I would like to show them to the House. The upshot of it was that on Herman Ridder's own figures, taking a report from the census as to quantity of paper, the amount of $61,000,000 was reduced to less than $30,000,000. And this is the gentleman on whose statement gentlemen on the other side of the House would ask this House to pass a tariff bill taking the duty off print paper and off pulp without regard or consideration to any other question in the case. Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling to go it blind in that way in any kind of legislation. Hundreds of millions of dollars are invested in this country in the paper business and in the pulp business. Sixty-odd thousand people are employed and get their livelihood out of the print-paper business. I am not willing to go into it without even an examination. The employees in the paper-mill factories protest against it. The owners of the paper mills protest against it, but they are not to be counted, the gentleman from Mississippi says, because we can not get the truth out of them as easily as you can get the truth out of a newspaper man who is looking at his own interests without regard to anybody else, and would have himself placed in a special privileged class, would have the duty taken off the article which he consumes without regard to the complaint of any other consumer in the United States.

They say that this duty adds to the price. How much? Mr. Ridder says it is going to be $22. Therefore he multiplies 1,100,000 tons, when the output is about 1,000,000, by $22, and says that they raise the price on us poor people $24,000,000! But there is only $6 a ton of tariff. Now, nobody who ever professed to take a free-trade stand upon the tariff question would ever claim that the duty added more to the price than the amount of the duty; but Mr. Ridder adds not only the duty, $6, but $22, on account of the tariff, and upon such a statement as that sensible men representing sensible constituencies are asked to go it blind and take the duty off pulp and paper. Mr. Speaker, the Province of Ontario has prohibited the exportation of pulp wood into the United States, although it would come in here free. The other provinces of Canada are discussing it. The Canadian Parliament is discussing it, and if we were foolish enough, without investigation, without any other tariff legislation, without placing Canada in the position of choosing between a minimum and a maximum tariff upon all the articles of import and export, to take this duty off print paper, they would immediately put a duty on pulp wood, or, what would be a greater protection, prohibit the exportation of pulp wood into the United States—and over one-third of the wood used in making paper in the United States is imported from Canada. Oh, all of these statements are merely allegations from beginning to end. The preamble well recites them as allegations, pure and simple, and the resolution is to ascertain the facts. Neither the gentlemen on the other side nor interested parties in the press who desire to have this tariff removed want the facts, but we will have the facts before we legislate. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] so much of my time as he may see fit to use.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there remaining?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, it had been stated that this tariff operates as a tax on intelligence. I am not offering myself as an exhibit in that connection. [Laughter.]

Sir, the discussion now going on in this Chamber is in relation to the tariff on wood pulp and print paper. The existing tariff on print paper is 15 per cent, and the present value of print paper is about $40 per ton, which makes the tariff rate $6 per ton.

Fifteen per cent is not only the present rate of the tariff on print paper, but that has been the rate for sixteen years past and under the last three tariff laws, two of which have been Republican and one of which has been Democratic.

Now, it is alleged that in the last year or two years the print paper of the kind generally used by the newspapers has been greatly increased in price to said newspapers by the International Paper Company and other paper manufacturers and dealers; and it is further alleged that this increase in price in the last year or so has been caused by the tariff.

Now, the first question that naturally and logically suggests itself to my mind is this: If it is the tariff that has made this increase in cost in the last year or two, why did not that increase in cost occur long before, because this same tariff rate has been in effect for the last sixteen years? What has that tariff been doing all these years? Has it simply lain dormant? And if so, what has caused it to break forth just now?

The Democrats in this House claim the way to deal with this question is to entirely remove the tariff from wood pulp and print paper. But the Republicans claim that if there has been any increase in the cost of print paper that that increase was caused either by the increased cost of labor and material, which is a natural increase, or that said increase was caused by an illegal combination among the manufacturers of paper and dealers therein.

If either of these contentions is correct, then it would not relieve the situation to repeal the tariff, because the increase was not caused by the tariff.

Therefore the situation in this Chamber to-day is that the Democrats are clamoring for the absolute repeal of the tariff on wood pulp and print paper, while the Republicans, under the leadership of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], claim that the only proper and efficient way to reach this trouble is to first find out the facts. We can not legislate intelligently without first knowing the facts.

And for that reason the gentleman from Illinois [Speaker CANNON] has introduced his resolution (H. Res. 344), which has just been read in full, and which is now pending before us for action. This resolution proposes to authorize an adequate and drastic investigation into this general subject of wood pulp, print paper, and the prices thereof, in order that we may act intelligently. I am distinctly in favor of the passage of this resolution.

The proposition to take the tariff off pulp and paper has been advocated largely—and I might say, entirely—by men engaged in the newspaper business. Time after time have I sat on this side of the House and heard the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] assert that when we begin to revise the tariff, it ought not to be on account of those who are interested in a particular commodity, but in behalf of the people generally. Now, then, we see a very peculiar exhibition here to-day of the gentleman basing his case in this particular instance upon the statements of those who are selfishly interested in this particular commodity. As I look over the United States at large and remember what has occurred in the last ten or twelve years, I fail to recall any considerable number of newspaper gentlemen who have gone into bankruptcy by reason of the tremendous price of print paper. I do recall, however, that one of the best personal friends I have, a gentleman of considerable intelligence, was wise enough a number of years ago to purchase largely on credit two daily newspapers in my own home city. During the intervening time he has been able, without reference to the tremendous price of print paper, to accumulate the modest sum of about $1,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.] He is not as much in need of relief as the gentleman from Mississippi and myself, and some others within my view at this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I desire to combat that portion of the statement which has been made that this is a tax on intelligence. Within the last few days there came to my desk a copy of a great American newspaper, the North American, of Philadelphia; not a Sunday issue, but a daily issue. I regret that I do not have that particular paper here now, but across the top of it is printed, "To-day's issue of the North American is the largest daily newspaper ever published in the United States, and contains"—what? not the largest amount of intelligence, but the "largest amount of advertising ever before published in a daily issue of any newspaper in the world." [Laughter and applause.] Seventy pages of the North American for sale for 1 cent. [Applause on the Republican side.] That was not a tax on intelligence; that was a tax on a billboard. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is known to most of my associates here in this House——

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr CUSHMAN. I have but a moment or two.

Mr. STANLEY. I want to ask one question.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Very well.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the gentleman wish to infer that a majority of the newspapers in the United States are billboards or bulletins, or that they really afford a valuable service in carrying information to the people?

Mr. CUSHMAN. They certainly do afford a valuable service, but the point I desire to make is this: When the Republican party starts in to revise the tariff it ought not to pick out one particular industry, and the one industry above all others that can best defend itself, but when we start to revise the tariff we ought to revise it intelligently and along broad lines, and on behalf not of one industry, but on behalf of all industries. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, it is known to most of my associates in this House that I have a warm, personal friendship for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I sometimes wonder how I can cherish as warm a personal feeling for a gentleman whose political policies inspire me chiefly with apprehension and distrust. [Laughter.] I am inclined to think that it is largely by reason of sympathy. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I naturally sympathize with any man on whose slender shoulders is placed the tremendous responsibility of trying to convince the American people that that bunch of organized incompetence, that incoherent mass of irreconcilable fragments known as the Democratic party [great laughter and applause on the Republican side], is in reality an aggregation of stainless statesmen and patriots. [Applause on the Republican side.] I think that all of us, considering the showing that the gentleman makes with the material he has to work with [laughter], ought to be kind to him. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I for one, am not misled by the purpose of this so-called filibuster. It is perfectly apparent to me that it is not legislation that the gentleman is seeking, but simply an opportunity to advertise the Democratic party. I have thought that at some time during this discussion when the gentleman sent out his messages "to the country" as to what the Democratic party when it gets in control was going to do for this nation in the near future, that the gentleman might have used a little time in explaining to the country what the Democratic party did do to this nation the last time it was in power.

And as to this filibuster, there may be some sense in roll calls upon different propositions where there is a difference in opinion, but of what use can a roll call be, for instance, upon the approval of the Journal, when it is known in advance that all Members of this House, including those who demand the roll call, will vote "aye?" How can such a criminal waste of time be justified? That can not even be dignified by the term of "peanut politics"—that is "mustard-seed politics." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] says he wants the country to know that the real legislative force in this House is not the Republican majority, but the Democratic minority. When I was a schoolboy, I was taught that the whole was greater than any of its parts. But the gentleman seems to desire to reverse that time-honored philosophy and make the country believe that a part is greater than the whole, and that a minority is stronger, numerically, than a majority.

Now, if the gentleman really desires to demonstrate to the country that the Democratic part of this House is to-day in control, I will say to him there are several ways in which you can do that. One of them is, you can defeat this resolution which we, the Republicans, are about to adopt. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

And inasmuch, sir, as you have asserted that the real legislative force in this House to-day is not the Republican majority, but the Democratic minority, there is another way you can prove that to the country—pass a free-coinage bill, 16 to 1. [Laughter on the Republican side.] That is what you say you believe in. Why do you not show the courage of your convictions? [Laughter.] Yes; and you might pass another bill providing for the Government ownership of railroads. [Laughter.] That is what your Presidential candidate, Mr. Bryan, believes in. You say you are in control of this House. Why do not you back him up before the country? [Laughter on the Republican side.] There are numerous other ways in which the gentleman might prove to the country that he and his party are in control, but I have not the time to recite them all.

Mr. Speaker, I was raised upon the farm. What little philosophy there is in my make-up I imbibed from these surroundings. On the farm of my grandfather, years ago, he had a certain mongrel dog of unknown antecedents and doubtful pedigree called "Tige." [Laughter.] In the courage and capacity of that same Tige my grandfather had great confidence. On that same farm there was also a certain unruly, crumple-horned, breachy, old cow called "Boss"—and she was well named, too. One summer afternoon my grandfather discovered that old Boss had knocked down a couple of panels of the worm fence and was grazing in the midst of the timothy meadow, contrary to the statutes in such cases made and provided. [Laughter.] He said, "Tige will fetch her out," and he yelled for the dog. The dog came out from under the smokehouse and grandfather pointed to the center of the meadow and said, "Fetch her out, Tige," and at a tremendous rate of speed and with a very fierce canine expression Tige made for the tall and uncut. That cow had a full-grown disposition of her own. [Laughter.] She lowered her head and made for that dog under a full head of steam, and he turned tail to and made for the gap in that fence. Every jump he took he could feel the hot air from that old cow's nostrils fanning his flanks.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, there was a race that was never surpassed or even equaled by anything pulled off on the Benning track. Tige covered that 40 rods in an amazing short space of time, and came out exactly 5¾ inches in the lead. Grandfather leaned back, with much complacence, and said, "I knew old Tige would fetch her out," although it appeared to the other spectators that old Tige had been fetched out.

And, Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that in this so-called "filibuster" the Democratic minority of this House have afforded us a similar spectacle. When they behold the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] grazing peacefully in the midst of the Republican legislative meadow, about ready to bring forth a piece of sound legislation, they wait until he is all ready to start, and then they call for the Democratic watchdog and say, "Bring him out, John." [Loud laughter and applause on the Republican side.] And then John, with the same enthusiasm and lack of judgment which was evidenced in old Tige, starts for the tall and uncut. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Speaker, the country has not failed to notice that when that legislative procession came out of the meadow the gentleman from Mississippi was not chasing the gentleman from New York, but, on the contrary, was being chased by him. [Long-continued laughter. and applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the preamble and resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Speaker. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 156, nays 112, answered "present" 9, not voting 110, as follows:

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, am I recorded as voting?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was sitting in the House during the first roll call and did not hear my name.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was.

The SPEAKER. Call the name of the gentleman.

The name of Mr. CAMPBELL was called, and he voted "yea."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee: Mr. MANN, Mr. MILLER, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. BANNON, Mr. SIMS, and Mr. RYAN.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I had occasion to make some remarks about Mr. William Loeb, jr., and he has written me a letter that I wish, in fairness to him, to read to the House and make a short statement in connection therewith.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. The letter is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 21, 1908.

SIR: I have read in the newspapers your speech of yesterday. Before making such statements in such a place, where one is shielded by Congressional privilege, it seems to me the most scrupulous care ought to have been taken to verify every fact to the end that injustice might not be done to any man's character or reputation. If you had made any attempt, even the slightest, to verify the facts, you would have saved yourself from making a statement so false in its effect, so misleading in its imputation, and so unfair to me and to your own sense of rectitude and honor. The facts are as follows:

First. Four thousand seven hundred shares of the common stock of the Washington Railway and Electric Company stand in my name on the books of the company. One hundred of these shares, enough to enable me to qualify as director, are mine; 4,600 are holdings of friends of mine for whom I simply acted as representative at the last annual meeting of the stockholders of the company, at which I was elected a director, with the view of my possible selection as president of the company if I decided to take up that line of work after leaving official life. This record has been and still is open to you or any other honest man at any time, and it clearly demonstrates that any insinuation that in any mysterious or unworthy way, or in any way whatever, I had accumulated such a considerable fortune as your speech implies is as unfair to me as it is unworthy of you.

Second. As to your intimation that I have improperly interfered in the traction legislation: Immediately after my election as a director of the company, the chairman of the House District Committee, Mr. SMITH, called upon me and started to ask my advice as to certain bills affecting the traction companies pending before the committee. I at once informed him that while I occupied the position of Secretary to the President, I could not and would not discuss with any Member of Congress any matters of legislation affecting the local public-service corporations. I have seen Chairman SMITH, who will verify this statement, and I cite this instance to show how scrupulously careful I have been to observe the proprieties in the case. No Senator or Representative, even among my intimate friends, has been either directly or indirectly approached by me on any phase of the traction legislation.

I submit that in all fairness you should immediately retract your statements reflecting on me in as public a manner as you made them, and also have them expunged from the RECORD.

Very truly, yours, WILLIAM LOEB, Jr.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Speaker, I am the last man who would take advantage of Congressional privilege to say anything about any man; therefore I felt that it was but proper and right upon my part to ask the indulgence of the House to read his letter, that the House might hear it and know what Mr. Loeb has to say about the matter.

Mr. Speaker, I made a statement of a fact that was taken from a letter addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, signed by George H. Harries, vice-president of the Washington Railway and Electric Company, dated January 31, 1908. There is attached to the report I read the following affidavit of George H. Harries, vice-president, and William F. Ham, treasurer:

We, George H. Harries, vice-president, and William F. Ham, treasurer, of the Washington Railway and Electric Company, do hereby solemnly swear that the foregoing and annexed statement is just and true to the best of our knowledge and belief.

GEORGE H. HARRIES, Vice-President.
WILLIAM F. HAM, Treasurer.

Then follows:

Appendix B. Washington Railway and Electric Company—list of stockholders.

In that list it appears that Mr. Loeb is the owner of 4,700 shares. It does not appear whether it is preferred or common, but appears to be owned in person and not as a representative or trustee. I stated the sworn fact, which appeared in a communication to this Congress, to the Speaker of this House, for the information of the House. Now, Mr. Loeb says that I might have found out the facts by the slightest investigation.

Mr. Speaker, can I presume that this sworn statement by the officers of the company in which he is a stockholder and a director did not speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth? It showed Mr. Loeb to own 4,700 shares. So this report is not only "false in effect," but false in fact, according to the letter which I have just read. Mr. Loeb only owned 100 shares, and the other 4,600 shares were stock that his friends held in his name, in order that he might be elected president of the company.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Loeb says:

This record has been and still is open to you or any other honest man at any time, and it clearly demonstrates that any insinuation that in any mysterious or unworthy way, or in any way whatever, I had accumulated such a considerable fortune as your speech implies is as unfair to me as it is unworthy of you.

I ask him, does the record disclose who the friends are whose stock appears in his name? Could I possibly be held responsible for not verifying an affidavit? What was there to cause me to suppose that the report under oath made to Congress did not state the truth?

I made no insinuation nor any statement that Mr. Loeb had accumulated a large fortune. We all know it is not necessary to have a large fortune in order to have stock in a corporation, if that stock can be used as collateral security. You can borrow money on it. I made no insinuation of that kind whatever. I intended to make that statement in connection with my remarks at the time, but I was rushed for time and let it slip.

Mr. Speaker, I never said one word about his attempting to influence legislation. It is not necessary for Mr. Loeb to verify anything he has said by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I take Mr. Loeb's word for it. I only referred to the fact that it was an embarrassing thing to know that a man of such powerful influence as he must be presumed to have was a stockholder in a public-service corporation, and I submit that it makes no difference whether it was 100 shares or 10,000 shares, so far as principle and conduct go.

Mr. Speaker, I never thought once that he had this stock because he had accumulated a large fortune in any way whatever. In fact, I never thought of him in connection with accumulation, except I thought the stockholders of this company had "accumulated him" by electing him a director for the purpose which was most natural to be supposed, and that was the influence that the very fact of his occupying and holding such a position would have on this legislative body. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that we are not always the best judges of what ought to be done in a matter in which we are the actors; that a man may himself not really see what is proper or what is just. I submit this letter and I submit my remarks to the judgment of this body, and if this House thinks that as a matter of justice to Mr. Loeb that what I have said ought to be expunged, you are more than welcome to do it.

Mr. GARRETT. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. I did not catch the reading of the letter as read by my colleague. Did the letter state who the gentleman was dummy for for the 4,600 shares?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the letter says that he only owned 100 shares, which was enough to enable him to be elected director, and that the other 4,600 were shares of friends placed in his name. I did not use the word "dummy" for that 4,600 shares, because it might be regarded as not kindly. I mean nothing unkindly to Mr. Loeb, but I want to say to him that, if he wants to keep this House from drawing natural conclusions, if he does not want to be misunderstood, let him resign from that board of directors or walk out of the executive offices at the White House. [Applause.]

COMPENSATION OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Accounts, I move to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution, which they unanimously report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the amounts hereinafter set forth for the purposes indicated, viz:

To the widow of Charles Carter, late janitor to the Committee on Appropriations, a sum equal to six months' pay at the rate of compensation received by him at the time of his death, and a further sum, not exceeding $250, on account of the funeral expenses of said Charles Carter; to the persons named in the resolutions adopted by the House February 16 and February 28, 1907, the several amounts therein set forth for the fiscal year 1908; to the following employees of the House as additional compensation for the fiscal year 1908: To the clerks to the Committees on Agriculture, Claims, District of Columbia, Foreign Affairs, Indian Affairs, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Judiciary, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Pensions, Public Buildings and Grounds, War Claims, clerk to continue digest of claims, $500 each; to the assistant stenographer to committees, $400; to the messengers to the Committees on Agriculture, Elections No. 1, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Printing, and Accounts, $280 each; to the thirty-two folders in the folding room, $100 each; to the assistant clerks to the Committee on Invalid Pensions and Committee on Pensions by detail from the Pension Bureau, $1,000 and $750, respectively; to Edward Reichard, for clerical services rendered the Committee on Mileage in the payment and computing of mileage of Members and Delegates, $500; for the services of an additional clerk to the Committee on Enrolled Bills for the remainder of the present session, $6 per diem; for the services of an assistant foreman in the folding room at the rate of $1,200 per annum until otherwise provided for by law; and so much of the resolution of February 5, 1908, authorizing a messenger in charge of telephones, as made said office in lieu of one folder, is hereby vacated; for the services of a messenger in the press gallery of the House and the press rooms in the House of Representatives Office Building at the rate of $1,000 per annum during the present Congress, until otherwise provided for by law, the appointment and removal of said messenger to be within the authority of the Committee on Accounts; for the services of an assistant clerk to the Committee on Banking and Currency at the rate of $1,200 per annum until otherwise provided for by law.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand a second, in order that the matter may be explained.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands a second, and under the rule a second is ordered. The gentleman from Massachusetts has twenty minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi has twenty minutes.

Mr. LLOYD. I want to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the resolution includes the pair clerks at the pair table?

Mr. O'CONNELL. It does not.

Mr. LLOYD. What is the purpose of the committee in regard to the pair clerks?

Mr. O'CONNELL. It is the purpose of the committee to follow out and take up the different resolutions submitted to them, and one of the resolutions submitted includes these clerks.

Mr. LLOYD. Then, it is the purpose of the committee to provide for these clerks?

Mr. O'CONNELL. It is the purpose of the committee to consider the matter. I do not know whether it is the purpose of the committee to report, for we have not voted on it as yet. They have the resolution under consideration.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman does not know whether there is any probability of the salary of the pair clerks being increased at all?

Mr. O'CONNELL. I am not in a position to vouch for the action of the committee. We have these matters under consideration and we intend to be as fair as we possibly can.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman for information whether the clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means is one of those clerks whose salary is raised?

Mr. O'CONNELL. It is not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Committee on Accounts does not think that that clerk is being overworked at this session? [Laughter.]

Mr. O'CONNELL. We have not heard of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is this a unanimous report of the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. O'CONNELL. It is a unanimous report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, to save the time of the House I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 196, nays 27, answered "present" 11, not voting 153, as follows:

AMENDING THE CUSTOMS ADMINISTRATIVE LAW.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 17506) to amend an act entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890, as amended by the act entitled "An act to provide revenues for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, with amendments, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 14 of the act entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890, as amended by the act entitled "An act to provide revenues for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That the decision of the collector as to the rate and amount of duties chargeable upon imported merchandise, including all dutiable costs and charges, and as to all fees and exactions of whatever character (except duties on tonnage), shall be final and conclusive against all persons interested therein, unless the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of such merchandise, or the person paying such fees, charges, and exactions other than duties, shall, within fifteen days after but not before such ascertainment and liquidation of duties, as well in cases of merchandise entered in bond as for consumption, or within fifteen days after the payment of such fees, charges, and exactions, if dissatisfied with such decision, give notice in writing to the collector, setting forth therein distinctly and specifically, and in respect to each entry or payment, the reasons for his objections thereto, and if the merchandise is entered for consumption shall pay the full amount of the duties and charges ascertained to be due thereon. Upon such notice and payment the collector shall transmit the invoice and all the papers and exhibits connected therewith to the board of three general appraisers, which shall be on duty at the port of New York, or to a board of three general appraisers who may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for such duty at that port or at any other port, which board shall examine and decide the case thus submitted, and their decision, or that of a majority of them, shall be final and conclusive upon all persons interested therein, and the record shall be transmitted to the proper collector or person acting as such, who shall liquidate the entry accordingly, except in cases where an application shall be filed in the circuit court of appeals within the time and in the manner provided for in section 15 of this act: Provided, however, That the board of three general appraisers, or a majority of them, who decided the case may, upon motion of either party, within thirty days from the date of the receipt of their decision by the collector, grant a rehearing of said case when, in their opinion, the ends of justice may require it. The general board of nine general appraisers shall have power to establish from time to time such reasonable rules of practice, not inconsistent with the law, as may be deemed necessary for the conduct of their proceedings and of the proceedings of the said board of three general appraisers, and to assign or reassign any case to any of such boards of three at any time before promulgation of decision, in order to secure uniformity of decision."

SEC. 2. That section 15 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 15. That if the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of any imported merchandise, or the collector, or the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the Board of General Appraisers, as provided for in section 14 of this act, as to the construction of the law and the facts respecting the classifications of such merchandise and the rate of duty imposed thereon under such classification, they, or either of them, may, within thirty days next after such decision, and not afterwards, apply to the circuit court of appeals of the United States within the circuit in which the matter arises for a review of the questions of law and fact involved in such decision. Such application shall be made by filing in the office of the clerk of said circuit court of appeals a concise statement of the errors of law and fact complained of, and a copy of such statement shall be served on the collector, or on the importer, owner, consignee, or agent, as the case may be. Thereupon the court shall order the Board of Appraisers to return to said circuit court of appeals the record and the evidence taken by them, together with the certified statement of the facts involved in the case, and their decisions thereon; and all the evidence taken by and before said appraisers shall be competent evidence before said circuit court of appeals. The said circuit court of appeals is further vested with the power, on the hearing of any appeal taken from the decision of a board of three general appraisers, to order said board to take additional testimony as to any particular fact or issue in dispute, and return the same to said court as soon as convenient, whenever the said court shall be of opinion that the ends of justice will be best subserved by this course of procedure. In other respects the parties litigant shall be required to introduce all of their evidence before the said Board of General Appraisers prior to its decision of the case. Such further evidence, with the aforesaid returns, shall constitute the record upon which such circuit court of appeals shall give priority to and proceed to hear and determine the questions of law and fact involved in such decision, respecting the classification of such merchandise and the rate of duty imposed thereon under such classification, and the decision of such court shall be final, and the proper collector, or person acting as such, shall liquidate the entry accordingly, unless said decision is reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States in any of the ways provided by the act approved March 3, 1891, entitled 'An act to establish circuit courts of appeals, and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes.' Said Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction and power to review such decision, and shall give priority to such cases, and may affirm, modify, or reverse such decision of such circuit court of appeals, and remand the case with such orders as may seem to it proper in the premises, which shall be executed accordingly. All final judgments, when in favor of the importer, shall be satisfied and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury from the permanent indefinite appropriation provided for in section 23 of this act. For the purposes of this section the circuit courts of appeals of the United States shall be deemed always open, and said circuit courts of appeals, respectively, may establish, and from time to time alter, rules and regulations not inconsistent herewith for the procedure in such cases as they shall deem proper."

SEC. 3. That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding thereto, after said section 30 thereof, a new section, to read as follows:

"SEC. 31. That all of the general appraisers of merchandise heretofore or hereafter appointed under the authority of said act shall hold their office during good behavior, but may, after due hearing, be removed by the President for the following causes, and no other: Neglect of duty, malfeasance in office, or inefficiency.

"That hereafter the salary of each of the general appraisers of merchandise shall be at the rate of $8,000 per annum.

"That the said boards of general appraisers and the members thereof shall have and possess all the powers of a circuit court of the United States in preserving order, compelling the attendance of witnesses, and the production of books, papers, and documents, and in punishing for contempt."

SEC. 4. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. A second is ordered under the rule. The gentleman from New York has twenty minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi has twenty minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this bill amends sections 14, 15, and 31 of the customs administrative law. Those sections apply to the practice before the Board of General Appraisers of the city of New York and to appeals and also to the salaries of these appraisers. The first section of this bill amends the fourteenth section of the act. The present law allows an importer only ten days in which to file a protest after liquidation and the payment of duties. This act extends it to fifteen days. The Board seems to think that if fifteen days are allowed it will give the importer more chance for deliberation and there will be fewer protests, and certainly it will give an importer more time to review the decision of the collector in case he finds it is wrong. Then this change provides, and that is new, that the Board of General Appraisers may give a rehearing on any case before them when, in their opinion, the ends of justice require it, and also gives them power to establish rules and regulations for practice before them which are not inconsistent with the law. The present law makes the decision of several subboards of general appraisers final as to all matters embraced within their jurisdiction, subject only to appeal to the circuit court, the Board having no power to correct errors other than manifest clerical errors. Power to grant a rehearing is nothing more than power to correct such errors as necessitate the importers or the Government to go through the process of carrying such errors by appeal to the court. A further proviso authorizes the General Board of nine general appraisers, on the receipt of a protest, to assign or reassign any case to any of such boards of three at any time before promulgation of decision, in order to secure uniformity of decision. I may say there are nine general appraisers, and they are divided into subboards of three each, any of which can hear these protests from the decision of the collector. The present law authorizes an appeal from the decision of the Board of Appraisers to the circuit court of appeals, where there may be a new trial. If this bill is agreed to, that appeal must be directly from the Board of Appraisers to the circuit court of appeals. It cuts out the circuit court, makes less litigation, and a speedier final determination. Appeal is provided for under the general law from the circuit courts of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. This provision is necessary in this bill because the circuit court of appeal was not created until after this administrative act was passed.

Another amendment in this section seeks to compel the importer to make out his case before the Board of General Appraisers. The custom now is, I might say, almost general for the importer to call a single witness, not to make out his case, and leave the general appraisers to decide against him, and then take the appeal to the circuit court, where the case may be heard on new evidence. He then brings in his witnesses, with new evidence upon new points not before considered, and without any chance on the part of the Government to prepare a defense to the evidence that is brought in. Of course the case before the circuit court of appeals must be tried hastily. In addition to that there are attorneys who appear for the Government before the Board of Appraisers, who are familiar with the customs laws and familiar with the cases, and if all the evidence is required to be presented before the General Board of Appraisers, they are there, expert in customs laws, ready to meet that evidence in case such evidence to meet it exists, whereas it often happens that when the case goes to the circuit court of appeals the district attorney's office is taken by surprise and they are not able to get the evidence that exists to meet the new case that is made out by the importer. This bill gives the importers and the Government every opportunity before the General Board of Appraisers to have their day in court on both sides and brings out all the evidence, and then upon the record it goes to the circuit court of appeals, with the further provision that if there is any issue or any question of fact upon which the circuit court thinks there should be additional evidence, they send it back to the appraisers for that evidence, and then they hear it upon the original record, with the additional evidence as returned to it. It is thought that this will greatly facilitate the business in the custom-house and will result in more uniformity and less injustice between the importers and the Government of the United States.

Section 31 as amended makes it impossible to remove an appraiser except upon charges and an opportunity to be heard. It was realized in the very beginning, at the passage of this law, that in order to insure efficiency by this Board the members of it should not be subject to removal at the mere whim or caprice of the President or anybody else. They are appointed from both political parties, a certain number from one party, and they should hold office during good behavier. This is what was intended to be provided for in the law as it now exists, that the President should not remove them except upon charges and for cause, but the President did remove one several years ago and it went to the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court decided that the President could remove them at pleasure. Now, this bill provides, if I can turn my eye to the particular paragraph, that they can only be removed by the President, not for political reasons, but after due inquiry, for reasons of neglect of duty, incompetency, or malfeasance in office. It is very important, the Government being one of the litigants on one side, that these men should be kept entirely independent of the Administration so that they may be able to perform their duties fearlessly and honestly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield? To what extent does this bill extend the tenure?

Mr. PAYNE. The tenure—why, the tenure is during good behavior, practically, now. This bill does not extend it at all, except that they can not be removed except upon inquiry and a hearing.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. For specific causes.

Mr. PAYNE. They are put in the same category as the judges who have these questions to determine.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What kind of a hearing do you give?

Mr. PAYNE. That is for the President to decide. Of course it must be a hearing upon inquiry and with opportunity for them to be heard. It would depend upon the President to determine.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the statute say that?

Mr. PAYNE. It does not provide anything about the rule of procedure before the President. There is another amendment which increases the salary of the general appraisers from $7,000 to $8,000 a year, and on this amendment I think some of the minority did not agree to the increase of salary. The original act as it passed the Senate provided for a salary of $10,000. The House reduced it to $5,000 by amendment, and in conference it was finally fixed at $7,000. Now, this Board reviews the action of the collector and the appraiser of the port of New York, the collector receiving $12,000 and the appraiser $8,000, and of course, as is well known, the salaries of the judges of the local courts in New York City are from $10,000 to $17,500 per year. This Board is required to live in New York City; their business is done there, and requires their constant attendance. They pass upon cases not only involving large amounts, but also sometimes involving very intricate questions of law, and it is essential that they should be men of the highest character for probity and ability, lawyers of the first class, in order to discharge the duties of this office, and the committee thought $8,000 was a small salary for gentlemen of this class. Now, that is a larger salary than the judges of the circuit courts receive, but because we do not pay one officer enough is no reason why, when we are amending a law, we should not pay another officer enough.

These people have to decide upon questions as important as those that come before the judges, and their salary ought to be in the neighborhood of those of the judges. I think in the city of New York that circuit judges ought to receive a good deal higher salary than Congress gives them. I think it is necessary for them to live there, and it is also necessary to get men of the highest ability to perform the duties of that office. Of course, the average lawyer in New York makes more money than any United States circuit judge. So the committee concluded to fix this salary at $8,000 instead of $7,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the difference between the cost of living, if the gentleman knows, in Washington and the cost in New York City?

Mr. PAYNE. I have only lived in Washington. I never lived in New York City. I have supposed that rents there, from what I have learned, are much higher than in Washington. I do not know why there should be much difference in the cost of food and provisions as between the two cities.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman spoke of two classes of officers there a while ago—one, I believe, is receiving now, or you want him to receive, $8,000, and the other is already receiving $12,000. What is the difference in the duties of the two classes of officers?

Mr. PAYNE. The collector receives $12,000. Of course, the collector is a person that handles the large interests. All the cases of the collection of the customs come before him, and it is well known a very large proportion of the customs are collected in the city of New York. It is a responsible office and the salary should be large. He has to give a large bond. The appraiser gets a salary of $8,000, and this board reviews the decision of both the collector and appraiser.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is not Judge Somerville one of the appraisers?

Mr. PAYNE. He is one of the appraisers; yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He used to be on the supreme bench in the State of Alabama, and is a very able man.

Mr. PAYNE. They are all men of first-class ability, all of them. Now, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. How much have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. LARRINAGA rose.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. LARRINAGA].

Mr. LARRINAGA. Does the gentleman understand that section 14, as it is worded here, covers the cases already decided by the court and in which I know the appraisers are not agreed?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; this only applies to the future. It does not apply to any case that has already been decided.

Mr. LARRINAGA. But they are cases in which the appraisers held that the decision of the court does not cover the cases in which they differ.

Mr. PAYNE. Then the proper remedy for the person aggrieved would be, under this bill, to appeal directly to the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. LARRINAGA. Now, does the gentleman think that a term of fifteen days will be sufficient for a colony a great distance away, like Porto Rico or the Philippine Islands?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; it is for the importer, and the importer resides in the city of New York, or his agent does; and it only applies to reappraisement, not classification. On the classification he has thirty days.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, there was not any sense in bringing this bill up by way of moving to suspend the rules. It is a privileged matter and could have been brought up at any time. There is only one sentence in this bill that I have any objection to, and that is the sentence on page 7, which fixes the salary of these appraisers at $8,000 per annum each. If the bill had come up by the ordinary method, that is, come up as a privileged measure, we could have amended the bill or attempted to do so, at least, by striking out that sentence. But, because of the position in which it is now, the only way we can get that sentence out, as I understand it, is by unanimous consent. As the Speaker decided here that you can do anything by unanimous consent, even bring an elephant onto the floor of the House, I suppose we could do that. The rest of this bill is a most excellent modification of the present system of appeals in tariff cases now. Under the way that it was done sometimes, they followed the practice of a good criminal lawyer in a preliminary trial, that is, the man that was contesting the justice of the collection of the tariff in any given instance in the appraiser's court would simply go through the motion of introducing evidence and then when it went to the higher court a new lawyer got hold of it for the Government that did not know anything about the case, and then the importer would develop his case in full and frequently do the Government up.

This bill, so far as it changes that practice, is an excellent one. It provides that the whole case shall be made up on paper before the appraisers, that the appeal shall lie directly from the Board of Appraisers to the United States circuit court of appeals, cuts out the intermediary court, and there it is tried on the transcript, except in some extraordinary case where the person can show that he had good reason for not introducing his evidence in the appraisers' court, then there is machinery provided with which he may go back and get some more evidence.

All that is all right. Every man on the committee was in favor of that part of this bill, and that is the big part of it. There is only one sentence to which we object, as I stated before.

I agree with the gentleman from New York in one thing; there is no dispute that the man who has anything to do with the business of collecting the customs revenue ought to be an expert. The truth is that there is not an expert in America sufficiently expert to know all about this complicated tariff system that we have now. So prominent an expert as ex-Secretary of the Treasury Leslie M. Shaw decided that ponies were household goods and frog legs were poultry under the tariff law. So I do not wonder at these experts getting mixed up about it. They ought to be skillful men.

There were pending before the committee several bills, and this was the least obnoxious of any of them. It gives these men a salary of $8,000. Their present salary is $7,200; but in addition to that, when they are traveling, they receive their traveling expenses and $5 a day for hotel bills. There was a proposition before the committee to raise their salaries to $10,000. We voted that down. Then there was a proposition to put them on a retired list after a while at half pay. We voted that down. I will never agree to such a proposition as that as long as I live. I am not in favor of starting a pension list from civil life.

Here you are before the House in this ridiculous attitude with this one sentence in it. Here are these excellent gentlemen; two of them served in the House with us, Mr. Devries and Mr. Fischer. Three of these gentlemen pass on a case. They are to get $8,000 a year apiece. Then the appeal lies from them to the United States circuit court of appeals, the judges of which get $7,500 a year apiece. That is hardly consonant with ordinary fair dealing.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Seven thousand dollars I think the gentleman will find is the salary of the judges.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Perhaps the gentleman is correct. If the salary scheme is just and meritorious, then the appeal in these customs cases ought to lie from the United States circuit court of appeals to this Board of Appraisers. [Laughter and applause.] I think everybody will agree to that. If the gentleman from New York will not object, I will ask unanimous consent of the House to take that one sentence out of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's seven minutes have expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I was not paying attention.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I was saying was this, that if the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will not object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield two minutes longer.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman from New York will not object, I will ask unanimous consent to amend this bill by striking that one sentence out of the bill, and then we will all vote for it.

Mr. PAYNE. What do you mean—about the salaries?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I can not consent to that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I will object to it, and I will vote against the bill and do all I can to defeat it, although I favor the rest of the bill. The truth is, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that the whole salary system of the United States needs overhauling and recasting. There is precious little sense in the present way of running it. A dozen times here—yes, dozens of times here—in the course of a session the Committee on Accounts comes in and raises certain salaries and does not raise them all. It gets up dissatisfaction among those persons whose salaries are not raised, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] made some sensible suggestions in the committee to the effect that all the proposed salary changes in this and other bills ought to be let alone until we can, after full consideration, recast it all at once, justly and symmetrically. I repeat it here now; and if they do not take that sentence out of this bill, so far as I am concerned, I am going to vote against it, although I do not ask another soul to do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], praising the action of the Republican party under the bill then before the House, called the attention of the House to what Mr. Cleveland said in reference to the Wilson bill when that bill became a law without the President's signature, which is something that the Republican Members of this House are fond of calling the attention of the House to, and claiming for that reason that the Wilson bill, a Democratic tariff bill, was badly prepared and badly written. But I notice that this bill gives evidence of the fact that the Democratic party is not the only party that prepares bills inartistically drawn and that need amendment, whether a Democratic President or a Republican President signs the bills or not.

This bill now pending before the House and that the House is asked to pass upon comes in here as an amendment to the act of July 24, 1897, "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," otherwise known as the "Dingley bill." Under the law as it has come down through the Dingley bill, we found that the most important Board in the United States, so far as the revenue of the Government was concerned, was acting under a law so inartificially drawn by the Republican party that they not only put the people of the United States to great expense, but the Government to great expense and great inconvenience. This important Board of General Appraisers, that passes on all the goods and the status of the goods that come into the United States from abroad, was treated under the law as contained in the Dingley bill as a justice of the peace court. It was a preliminary trial of the great questions involved before that Board, questions that involved millions and millions of dollars every year, and if the importer did not wish to risk his case and merely wanted to develop the Government's side of the case, he allowed the Government to develop its evidence, closed the case, and took an appeal to the district court of the United States, where the question was open de novo, and he had a chance to develop his case entirely again, before new officers of the Government and new judges; and then, if he was not satisfied, he could pursue his way on up to the Court of Appeals, and, if the proper questions were involved, to the Supreme Court of the United States.

And this condition of affairs has been allowed to exist and continue in this country for the last twelve or fifteen years; but at this late day, now that the country is waking up to the fact that the Dingley law is not satisfactory, that a revision of the tariff is necessary, our friends on the other side of the House have become aroused to the fact that the customs-collection law in reference to the revenue is not satisfactory, and have therefore brought before this House a practical, sensible bill, a bill that gives this commission, this Board of Appraisers, an opportunity to pass on all these questions at one time, and requires the importer to develop his evidence before that board at that time; and then if he wants to take an appeal, not to delay it by going through the district court, but to carry it direct to the court of appeals, and thereby save money to the people, money to the men who are engaged in importing goods into this country, so that they will not be involved in litigation to the extent that they heretofore have been, and save money to the Government and expedite the administration of justice. I congratulate the gentlemen on the other side of the House that at this late day they have waked up to the proposition of amending the Dingley tariff law to some extent by this change in the customs revenue collection provisions of that act. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield one minute of that time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS].

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I am compelled to speak against this bill, because of the provisions in the second section. That is the section which has just been alluded to by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and which provides that appeals from the Board of General Appraisers shall be taken direct to the circuit court of appeals instead of first to the circuit court.

Four-fifths of the customs cases in the country are in the city of New York. The circuit court of appeals of the second circuit is now the hardest-worked circuit court of appeals in the country. The district attorney for the southern district of New York this morning testified before a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary that if this bill passed—and I call the attention of the House to this statement—it would add 200 appeals a year to the circuit court of appeals for the second circuit, and would put us farther and farther behind. It has been argued that the effect of the bill would be to limit the appeals; but the language of the bill does not accomplish that purpose, and the statement was made before the subcommittee that the judges in New York are now preparing a memorial to Congress against the bill, in order to have these provisions changed. I therefore hope that the bill will be defeated, because of the great and impossible burden that that action will impose on the circuit court of appeals of the second circuit. And I will say this, Mr. Speaker, that neither the district attorney nor the judges were questioned before the committee, nor was any statement called for from them when the bill was under consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Missouri about this bill. There is no opportunity to change this salary back to what it was, and I shall vote against it.

I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Missouri in the criticism he makes as to the pending measure, but I take the floor to call the attention of the Speaker and the House to the paper-trust proposition, involving as it does the tariff, and submit: That in 1904 the Department of Justice filed a suit in the Federal court in Minnesota to enjoin the "General Paper Company and twenty-three other corporations" engaged in the manufacture of and in restraint of Federal commerce in news-paper material, and so forth. March 12, 1906, the Federal Supreme Court, affirming the action of the lower court, decreed that the defendant obey the order of the court and bring their books, and so forth, into court for examinatoin in this case. The report of the opinion of the Supreme Court can be found at page 92 of 201 Supreme Court Report, and also on page 117. Later on—that is, on May 11, 1906—a decree in favor of the Government was entered in the case, and I call your attention to the language used by the Department of Justice in its usual report, which I now read:

On May 11, 1906, judgment was ordered in favor of the Government by the circuit court for the district of Minnesota, dissolving the combination and affording the Government all the relief prayed for in its bill.

Note the language, "all the relief it prayed for." And yet the reading public and Congress is here praying in the same manner for relief. The question that I ask is, How much relief did the Government pray for? It was granted, it seems, by this injunctive decree, "all" it asked for. The public press at the time stated this was a consent decree, which was entered, of course, as the judgment of the court. And yet, it seems, the ink was not more than dry on the minute book before the press and the reading public were crying out against the paper trust, which is taxing the intelligence of the entire reading and publishing public. If the Department had gone, as we have prayed for on this side, in this and other trust matters, and as we pray to-day, and turned this matter over to the Federal grand jury in Minnesota, given that tribunal the record and the evidence upon which this consent decree was made, the press of this country and the printing public would not to-day, I believe, be burdened, nor would Congress be burdened with this paper trust, nor would it have been necessary to pass even the compromised measure which was passed by this House to-day. Why did not the Department of Justice invoke the criminal law set out in our Federal antitrust statutes? Why did not the Department, in addition to the injunctive process it invoked, bring into action this powerful criminal statute? Why parley with an injunction only? Let the injunction, Mr. Speaker, wrought by Federal penitentiary, be thrown around the lawless members of this trust and they will be enjoined to some purpose and some permanent good will be done. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this provision of the bill passed the last Congress after my friend from New York City had been heard. The fact of it is, the bill will not increase the number of cases that go to the circuit court of appeals, because the bill provides for a full hearing before the board of appraisers. There each party will have a chance to be heard in full on the evidence, and there will be less inducement to appeal from that decision than there is now from the decision of the circuit court.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. I have so little time I can not yield now. This bill was passed in the last House, and it went over to the Senate, but too late for action. I did not hear anything of the protest of the district attorney, except through the gentleman from New York, at that time. I heard nothing from the judges of the circuit court of appeals at that time, nor from the time the House passed the bill until now.

I introduced the same bill early in the session, and I have not heard a word from either of these parties, and now at the last moment they have come in with it on a false basis, because it will not have the operation that they claim it will. Gentlemen lay some stress on the language in the bill that allows the circuit court of appeals to send it back to the appraisers for additional evidence, but they can only send it back to take additional testimony as to any particular fact or issue in dispute. This is not a new trial, but the Board of Appraisers is to take the evidence as to any particular fact or issue in dispute, so if the circuit court of appeals thinks that the question is material to the issue they can send it back and let it be heard in the circuit court of appeals upon all the evidence, that taken in the first instance, and that taken upon the order sending the case back.

Mr. Speaker, this reform ought to be made; the expense and delay of these cases between the general appraisers and the circuit court and then to the circuit court of appeals constitute a scandal. The judges of the circuit court are sometimes called in without the slightest experience, coming from other parts of the State of New York, and make rulings, some of which never ought to go into the reports. The judges of the circuit court of appeals in New York become experts upon these matters, and they are the judges that should deal with them. There is no sense or justice in the present law, but simply delay in sending these cases by the roundabout way, first to the circuit court and then to the circuit court of appeals and finally to the Supreme Court of the United States. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—ayes 137, nays 87, answered "present" 13, not voting 150, as follows:

For the balance of the day:

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota with Mr. REID.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan with Mr. LINDSAY.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan with Mr. HAMMOND.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio with Mr. GRANGER.

Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia with Mr. GILL.

For the session:

Mr. BOUTELL with Mr. GRIGGS.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to vote "no" upon this proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OLCOTT). Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. BYRD. I was in the lobby.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. I am afraid under the circumstances the gentleman can not vote.

Mr. BYRD. I would like to be marked "present" before the roll call is over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. I think that is against the rules.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one moment only to make a little additional statement to the one which I made a moment ago, respecting my remarks of yesterday on the Union Station trackage bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I stated yesterday in my remarks upon the Union Station trackage bill that a certain Senator, a member of the District Committee, was the owner of shares of the stock of the Capital Traction Company. I have since been informed that this stock came into his hands as trustee of an estate before he entered public life; that it was a portion of a considerable block of stock, which has been gradually sold; that when the railroad bill came up before the District Committee, he informed the committee that this stock stood in his name and stated that he would not participate in their action upon the subject, and that he has not participated in any action taken by the District Committee or the Senate upon this subject.

DISPOSAL OF LANDS VALUABLE FOR OIL AND ASPHALTUM.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 17827) to provide for the disposal of lands chiefly valuable for oil and asphaltum.

The SPEAKER. Has it amendments?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes; committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill with amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17827) to provide for the disposal of lands chiefly valuable for oil and asphaltum.

Be it enacted, etc., That public lands of the United States in the State of California chiefly valuable for mineral oil or asphaltum may be acquired under the provision of this act, and from and after the passage of this act such lands may not be located as placer mining claims.

SEC. 2. That any citizen of the United States over the age of 21 years, and any person who has filed his declaration of intention to become such citizen, may file a declaration, under oath, with the register and receiver of the land district where such land is situated that he intends to claim and improve or cause to be improved for the oil or asphaltum thereon a tract of land, describing it, not exceeding 160 acres. If such land be surveyed, it shall be located by legal subdivisions, and if unsurveyed, it shall be located in rectangular form by metes and bounds, according to the system of public-land surveys and described with certainty by reference to some well-established and conspicuous post, monument, or natural object. In no case shall a claim be more than 1 mile in length. Such oath shall be made before the register or receiver aforesaid or before the clerk of any court of record in the land district where the land is situated, and shall state that the affiant believes such land to be chiefly valuable for its deposits of mineral oil or asphaltum and distinctly his reasons for so believing; that he intends to make or cause to be made a bona fide effort to produce oil or asphaltum on said land in paying quantities; that he has not previously claimed any land in the same county under the provisions of this act.

Upon filing said declaration the declarant shall pay to the receiver a fee equal to 25 cents per acre of the land claimed, and thereupon the register shall enter such application upon his books, and no entry or filing shall thereafter be received for said land until such claim has been abandoned, as herein provided. But nothing herein contained shall be held to deny or abridge the right to enter said lands for the purpose of discovery and development of metalliferous minerals nor the assertion of a mineral claim thereto. If the claimant has made his declaration of intention to become a citizen, or if he be a naturalized citizen, he shall furnish satisfactory record evidence of that fact, which evidence shall be filed with the declaration and be thereafter conclusive of the right of the party to enter the land, if the claim shall have passed to an innocent purchaser.

SEC. 3. That at any time within three years from the filing of the claim aforesaid the claimant or his successor in interest may file an application for patent. Such application shall show the applicant's right to or interest in said claim; that there has been made such drillings or excavations on said claim as enables the claimant to produce oil or asphaltum, or both, in commercial quantities; the character and extent of the improvements thereon; that the land is valuable for its deposits of oil and asphaltum and is sought chiefly for the oil and asphaltum therein contained, and that it is the bona fide intention of the applicant to produce such products therefrom in commercial quantities; if the application be made on behalf of one or more individuals, that each of them is a citizen of the United States over the age of 21 years, or that he has made his declaration of intention to become such; if on behalf of a corporation, that it is duly organized under the laws of some State or Territory, and has a valid charter authorizing it to take, own, and operate such property. Application on behalf of an individual shall be made by himself; on behalf of two or more, by either of them; and on behalf of a corporation, by the president, vice-president, or secretary thereof. At final proof, documentary evidence shall be submitted as to matters of record; and as to the character of the land, the improvements, and production there shall be furnished the testimony of two disinterested witnesses. No individual or corporation shall be a party to final proof proceedings under this act on more than one claim: Provided, That if there are any veins or lodes of quartz or other rock in place bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, copper, or other valuable deposits known to exist at date of filing such application for patent, title thereto shall not pass under any application, entry, or patent under the provisions of this act, but are hereby expressly declared to be reserved therefrom, and such known veins or lodes shall be subject to location and entry by any qualified person or persons under the provisions of the existing United States mining laws applicable thereto: Provided, however, That any declarant who discovers any vein or lode bearing asphaltum, gilsonite, elaterite, or other like substances within the limits of the land included in his declaration or entry under this act shall have the preferential right for a period of ninety days after discovery of such vein or lode within which to locate same under the provisions of the general mining laws of the United States and must file with the register and receiver of the land district where the land is located a copy of the location notice.

SEC. 4. That upon receiving and filing an application for patent such notice shall be given and such proceedings had as are required for final proof on a mineral entry. If the final proofs are satisfactory, patent shall be issued upon payment to the receiver of the sum of $5 per acre.

SEC. 5. That proceedings under this act shall not give the claimant, before patent, any right to the surface of said land for agricultural, grazing, nor for any other purpose than that permitted by this act, nor the right to fence or inclose the land (except corrals for protection of domestic animals), nor the right to take any wood or timber therefrom except fuel for domestic purposes used thereon or in the vicinity of the lands by those engaged in the development of the oil or asphaltum thereon.

SEC. 6. That during each year after the filing of said declaration and before final proof the claimant or his successors in interest shall pay to the receiver a sum equal to 50 cents per acre of said claim, or submit proof, supported by two witnesses, that he has expended during said year an equal sum in a bona fide effort to discover and produce oil or asphaltum on said claim or on land at a point within one mile of said claim, where there is no producing well or shaft within 3 miles of said claim.

SEC. 7. That the following shall constitute an abandonment of a claim under this act:

First. Failure to make the annual payment or the expenditure herein required. Failure to file proof of such expenditures shall be prima facie evidence of a failure to make such expenditures.

Second. Failure to apply for patent within the time specified.

Third. Filing a declaration of abandonment with the register of the land office.

SEC. 8. That anyone holding and owning a mining claim for land chiefly valuable for the oil or asphaltum thereon may abandon said mining claim and reenter the same under this act, or so much thereof as he is entitled to enter under this act, in the following manner: He shall execute and deliver to the register of the land office an instrument in writing surrendering and conveying to the United States all his right, title, and interest in and to said land. Said instrument shall be executed and acknowledged so as to be entitled to be recorded under the laws of the State where the land is situated. Upon delivering said instrument to the register, together with the fee for recording the same in the county where the land is situated, the mining title shall be extinguished, and the party surrendering the title may thereupon make his entry as herein provided. The register shall immediately cause said conveyance to the United States to be duly recorded in the county where the land is situated.

SEC. 9. That an act entitled "An act to authorize the entry and patenting of land containing petroleum and other mineral oils under the placer mining laws of the United States," approved February 11, 1897, and all other laws, so far as they allow oil or placer asphaltum claims upon the public lands in the State of California, are hereby repealed, but nothing in this repeal shall affect proceedings heretofore begun to acquire title under any of said provisions of law so repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands a second. Under the rule, a second is ordered. Is the gentleman from Arkansas on the committee?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I am on the committee.

The SPEAKER. And opposed to the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON. I demanded a second for the purpose of asking an explanation of the bill. I was not present when the bill was considered by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Mississippi opposed to the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not say, hardly, whether I am or not.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Arkansas, who is on the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is he opposed to the bill?

The SPEAKER. No; he is not opposed to the bill, but he is on the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am a good deal in favor of the bill, but I want to get an explanation.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, a second is ordered. The gentleman from California is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Arkansas to twenty minutes.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to allow an entry of Government land that is supposed to contain mineral oil—what we call "oil land." At the present time the only law which is recognized that gives a right to acquire that kind of land is the mining law. The oil land in California has been entered as a placer mining claim. The objection to using that law is that oil very seldom, if ever, shows on the surface, and therefore there is no discovery of a valuable mineral product, which is the foundation of all mineral entries. The result has been that in order to get hold of the land on which the oil operator desires to drill or to make a mineral entry is to make the assertion that it contains gypsum or some other substance that would bring it within the mineral law. Now, as a
